Are children safe in our schools?

There is no issue more central to the American System than that of free, compulsory universal public education. There is no barometer more telling in judging whether the United States can survive and prosper than the state of the nation's schools. We are looking at that barometer, and the reading is very frightening.

From approximately 12-13 years old, children in our schools are being destroyed by drugs. This is not a sociological phenomenon. It is not caused by the guilt of parents. The spread of psychotropic drugs is the consciously wielded tool of evil minds. The local pusher is financed and supplied by an international cartel identified by the National Anti-Drug Coalition as Dope, Inc.—a conspiracy headed by the British-centered European oligarchy and protected by politicians "above suspicion."

Dope, Inc. has moved full-scale into the United States thanks to the Carter administration, as David Goldman proves in this issue, and they are using drugs to destroy the moral values associated with the idea of scientific progress that built America.

But drugs are not enough for these evil men and women: now they want to begin at the age of five with the "sex education curriculum" being piloted in New Jersey to turn your children into perverts, homosexuals, prostitutes—mentally crippled individuals ready to be permanently manipulated by mind-altering chemicals.

The National Anti-Drug Coalition has pledged itself to stop this assault on the nation's children and save our children to live productive, creative lives.

The essence of education, as our forefathers understood it and as the majority of moral Americans still understand today, is that the child is a child and he must be changed to become an adult. His or her infantile, selfish tendencies, the tendency to act on the basis of sensual impulses, must be opposed and corrected. At the same time, his or her human potential which lies in the full realization of creative mental powers, must be developed.

The child must assimilate from the achievements of the great men and women of the past. He must develop an attention span. When he or she is ready to make a contribution to the future of humanity, the child has become an adult.

What is at stake

It is emphatically not a matter of "personal taste." Only by continually raising the educational level of the citizenry can we meet the challenges posed to humanity as the fixed "resources" of a given technology are exhausted. The exploitation of nuclear energy, the commercial development of fusion power, and the colonization of what is now "outer space" represent the key challenges at this time.

As these scientific frontiers are mastered, not only will the United States prosper, but the multitudes of the globe, especially below the Tropic of Cancer, owe their only hope for survival to precisely this continuation of the American System of progress here in the United States.

Progress is therefore America's mission; it is what our youth will achieve to uplift the backward peoples of the world and thus guarantee peace. It is also the only guarantee of military readiness in case of war.

It is from this standpoint that not only parents, but all patriots, must be deeply alarmed about the state of our schools. A report to the National Science Foundation by Prof. Isaac Wirszup of the University of Chicago documents the shocking fact that the Soviet Union has now far surpassed the United States in the mathematics and physical science training of its youth.

Bill of rights for parents

- Drugs, emphatically including the so-called soft drug marijuana—whose destructive effects work so subtly that one doctor we know calls it “more dangerous than heroin”—must be kept out of the schools. Parents have the right to demand that drug peddling and consumption, which is a crime, be kept off school grounds by principals and law enforcement officials.

Even if an individual child escapes drug usage, the climate created by the marijuana culture is absolutely inimical to learning. Latest government figures show that 11 percent of high school seniors now smoke marijuana daily. The cocaine consumption figures are comparable. We must have cold turkey in the schools—at once.

- “Sex education” is the latest cruel hoax for brainwashing our children, devised by the same crowd that experiments with drugs on innocent victims, and for the same purpose—destroying Americans’ moral commitment to progress by destroying the nation’s posterity, our youth. Parents have the right and responsibility to find out if such social-engineering programs are being used in their schools. They have the right to resist the effort to introduce “value-free” teaching of sex and the peddling of prostitution and homosexuality as “alternate lifestyles.”

- The nation needs a massive gearup in the teaching of math and science subjects from the standpoint that technological progress is both essential to the survival of mankind and coherent with the physical laws of the universe. The “new math” and programs such as the National Science Foundation’s “Man, A Course of Study” are to be rejected on the grounds that they deny creative reason as the unique characteristic of the human mind, and attempt to convey that man is simply another animal—like the New Jersey “sex education” hoax.

War on Drugs is committed to building a national movement to make our schools safe for children again. Over the next months we will publish information on where the candidates for Congress, the Presidency, and other public offices stand on the drug issue. We will also make available information on citizens’ referenda against the drug plague. We urge every patriot to join the National Anti-Drug Coalition and help us win this war.

Mindsnatchers to plan 'future' in Toronto

Hordes of kook cultists, ranging from believers in psychic phenomenon and out-of-body experiences to UFO watchers and practicing witches will be descending on Toronto July 20-24 for intensive discussions on how to transform you, your children and your neighbors into raving lunatics who appreciate the virtues of "living with less" and "dying with dignity."

The occasion is the First Global Conference on the Future, sponsored by the World Future Society and the Canadian Future Society. Both are clearinghouses for the counterculture onslaught against the U.S. population that describes itself as the Aquarian Conspiracy.

More than 4,000 people—including highly placed government officials and advisers—are expected to attend. The entire staff of the Congressional Clearinghouse on the Future will be participating.

Under the rubric "Through the 80s: Thinking Globally, Acting Locally," this invasion of mindsnatchers will be working to see that the Aquarian ideology—with its antipathy to science, technology, and economic development—becomes the dominant American belief structure over the next few years.

The meeting is being run by top-echelon puppet-masters for the world's ruling elite, including Aurelio Peccei, the founder of the genocide-promoting Club of Rome, and Maurice Strong, a Canadian-based financier who sits on the board of the Aspen Institute and maintains ties to the British monarchy.

As honorary conference cochairman, Strong has described the meeting's purpose as a "launching pad for that important action to occur in the 1980s." The "important action" is the transformation of "the attitudes, values, and expectations of people. This will mean for industrialized societies a virtual cultural revolution. The dominant culture must be one that places highest values on quality rather than quantity, on conservation rather than waste, on cooperation above competition.

"If real changes are to take place in our technological society," Strong concludes, "they must first and foremost be conceived and take root here at Toronto...."

The content of Strong's "cultural revolution" can be readily gleaned from the conference agenda—which reads like a sci-fi buff's weirdest fantasies. All the perversions for creating a completely docile population which the Aquarians have been quietly concocting and experimenting with for the past 30 years—psychotropic drugs, biofeedback, religious cults, ecology, rock music, popular culture—will be brought out of the closet and readied for mass public implementation.

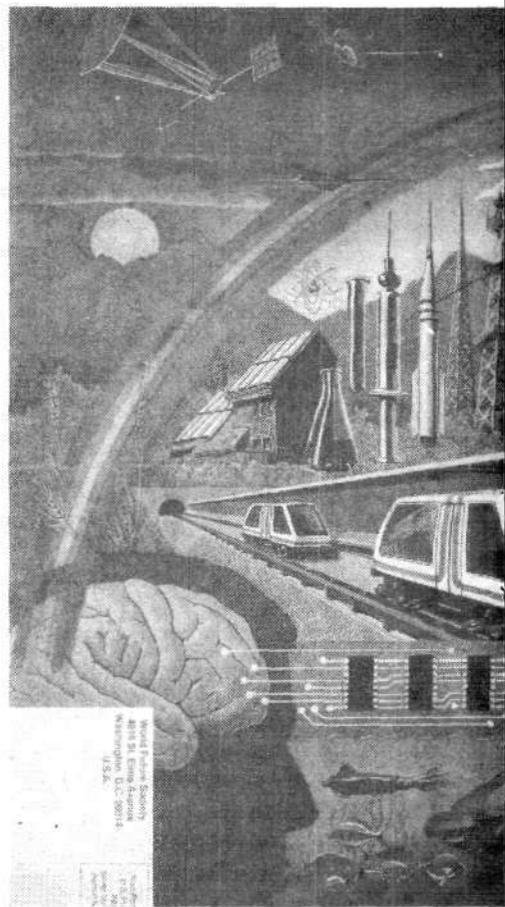

Among the hundreds or so panels we find: "Complex Problems and Scarce Resources," where panelists will "recommend ways of actualizing cooperation among community agencies to cope with scarcity and disruption" of resources; "Learning to Live More Modestly in the Future," where the proposition that "it is highly advisable if not imperative that people in advanced nations learn to live more modestly in the future" will be discussed; "The Future Human: An Exploration into Evolutionary Potential," which will examine "Expanded consciousness, space development, longevity, super-health, super-intelligence, artificial intelligence, synergistic social organization;" "The Reawakening of Eve ... the reemergence of the feminine archetype in religion, feminine consciousness in society;" "Frontiers of The Future," featuring self-described "High Priest of the Psychedellic Age," Timothy Leary; and "New Faces for Authoritarianism: From Friendly Fascism to the Crazy States."

Kook-World Luminaries

In addition to Peccei and Strong, conference panelists include these luminaries of the kook-world:

The Aspen Institute's Sir Harlan Cleveland, whose expertise is turning society against science.

- Dennis Meadows: author of the Club of Rome's original report calling for reducing the world's population by two-thirds.

- Theodore Roszak: one of the architects of the counterculture. Roszak just published a book, Person/Planet: The Creative Disintegration of Industrial Society, which praises death as "the core of the human experience."

- Willis Harman: based at Stanford Research Institute, Harman led the study group that produced the Institute's 1974 report, The Changing Images of Man. That study, which is the conference's working document, details how mankind's behavior can be changed from industrialism into a nonmaterial "spiritualism."

- William Whitsun: Director of military and defense policy division of the Congressional Research Service, Whitsun is now working full-time on injecting the Aquarians' proposals into the 1980 presidential campaign. A controller of California's Zen Buddhist governor Jerry Brown and a backer of John Anderson, Whitsun recently told a reporter that "There is a whole new line of technology coming up which could render defense weapons obsolete. Consider this: The targeting mechanisms for our ICBMs are on magnetic tape. By an active mind, Uri Geller (the Israeli-born psychic who bends spoons with "mind waves") has already wiped out information on such tapes. What happens if, as a war is initiated, you discover you've lost the guidance programs because of the enemy wiping out the key parts of the tape?" Whitsun's proposal that the United States develop "psychic weapons" has been taken up by the Pentagon. And this is only for starters!

Is the U.S. becoming . . .

A mind-destroying poison is turning into one of America's biggest cash crops, in place of food—and the Carter administration is taking no enforcement or economic measures to stop it.

This is the shocking truth about the $4 billion and rapidly growing U.S. marijuana growing business, which already amounts to one tenth of the country's marijuana "industry."

Just as debt-pressed Third World countries like Colombia and Jamaica are having their entire economies turned into marijuana exporting mills, now economically depressed American farmers are being spurred by the drug lobby to go to "pot" as the solution to their financial problems. The result: not only a boom in the marijuana supply, but the destruction of morality of entire regions of the country.

In California, Washington, Oregon, Tennessee, Florida and Kentucky marijuana cultivation has grown to be among those states' ten largest crops. In Tennessee it now ranks fifth; in northern California second or third. According to a confidential Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) report, marijuana is California's tenth largest cash crop ranking between almonds and strawberries.

Monetarily the U.S. marijuana growing business is rapidly overtaking its long established counterpart in Colombia, which at $7 billion annually has been the greatest source of marijuana for U.S. markets. Currently $4 billion and rapidly increasing, the flourishing U.S. crop already constitutes one tenth of the $40 billion U.S. "pot" industry.

Last October (1979), the Humboldt County, California Board of Supervisors voted to turn down a $19,643 federal grant from the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration aimed at curbing that area's marijuana growing industry. The county, at the northeast tip of California, has been identified by the DEA as one of the top major suppliers of sinsemilla marijuana to the rest of the country—between 50 and 150 tons per year.

Sinsemilla, or seedless, marijuana, is a highly potent form of the drug because of its richness in THC content, the ingredient that produces the "high."

The federal government estimates that the 1978 sinsemilla crop in Humboldt County alone was worth $168 million. In the tri-county area including Mendocino and Trinity counties, it is unofficially estimated that commercial marijuana growers bring in some $900 million a year.

The rationale for turning down the federal grant was identical to the World Bank's rationale for transforming Colombian agriculture (page 9). Humboldt County is an economically depressed area, with unemployment at about 15 percent and small farms constantly failing. Growing marijuana, the argument goes, is a godsend.

For the individual farmer the cited figures translate into the following: the average yield from a single marijuana plant, which costs about $5 to grow, is 1 to 1½ pounds of dried leaves and flowers. The sales price is $2,000 a pound. Not only does "pot" growing allow farmers to survive who would have otherwise failed, but it is pumping money into a depressed community.

The consequences

Perhaps nothing could illustrate the consequences of mindless "free enterprise" more soberly than what has occurred in northern California. Having been forced to purchase local "recovery" at the expense of millions of American youth who are smoking their poisonous product, Humboldt County residents are also undergoing a massive increase in murders, kidnappings and armed robberies.

Townspeople have turned into vigilantes to protect their crop. State forestry officials report that their men live under constant threat of violence from the growers, who warn them to keep their planes out of the area or be shot out of the sky.

Unable to deal with the increase in violent crimes, Humboldt County officials are bending the law. District Attorney Dipioli described the policy of his office as follows:

"We must consider the armed robber of the cultivator more dangerous than the cultivator and we have said in cases where if they're willing to tell the truth about their entire commercial operation and willing not to engage in it any further, we will give you immunity so we can get the people who tried to kill you or rip you off put in prison. But the condition of that is that they no longer continue growing marijuana."

He added: "Now I don't know how effective that is because you certainly can't enforce it."

Who's pushing it

Both the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws and the Committee Against Marijuana Prohibition (NORML and CAMP) have launched a drive to decriminalize home cultivation of three marijuana plants, with several states targeted. Alaska has already passed such legislation. (Three plants produce from five to nine pounds of the weed.)

In California the bill is sponsored by Assemblyman Willie Brown, a San Francisco Democrat. Before his election Brown was the lobbyist for Resorts International. As documented in the paperback Dope, Inc.: Britain's Opium War Against the United States, Resorts International is a subsidiary of the Meyer Lansky-controlled organized crime apparatus that plays a key role in international drug trafficking.

Gov. Jerry Brown decriminalized marijuana in California.

The drug lobby is acting to protect its industry in other ways. Keith Stroup, a founder of NORML, has filed a lawsuit against the DEA's California program. He contends that the low-flying planes and helicopters used by the DEA to locate marijuana fields and rip up the plants are an invasion of the right to privacy!

The marijuana growers and their political pals are also playing a key role in the environmentalist battle to stop use of pesticides by the government, farmers and the timber industry. They fear that these pesticides, which are necessary to produce a healthy and abundant food and timber crop, may destroy their filthy marijuana crop.

Most cynical of all, the drug lobby is manipulating the situation to push for full legalization of marijuana. Through Keith Stroup's "Grow America" plan, people would form limited-partner group syndicates (sharecropping) for marijuana growing, a practice Stroup says is already covertly going on in Arkansas.

NORML argues that the solution to the murder and theft problem is to legalize pot, and moreover this will give a powerful jolt to the troubled U.S. economy. A jolt indeed—straight toward oblivion.

Coast Guard cutbacks open

The Carter administration, through both budgetary policy and through decisions concerning the so-called Cuban refugee crisis, has severely gutted U.S. Coast Guard drug patrols. The situation is so serious that drug enforcement officials predict that it will soon result in the worst drug smuggling epidemic in U.S. history, at a point when heroin is already flooding the country at unprecedented levels.

Coast Guard officials, anticipating an increase in drug trafficking, last February requested an additional $37 million budget allocation. The Carter administration has yet to back to this request. Instead, it is suggesting major cuts in the Department of Transportation, the executive department that controls the Coast Guard. Carter Transportation Secretary Neil Goldschmidt reportedly views drug enforcement as a "low priority" for allocation.

Crisis point

Coast Guard officials report that the current Cuban refugee exodus has brought the situation to a crisis point. As of next week, half of the entire East Coast fleet of Coast Guard cutters will be on station off the Florida Straits to interdict the refugee flow. This will be the largest single fleet under one command since the end of World War II. The problem, according to worried drug enforcement officials, is that this huge fleet deployment in the Florida Straits and the removal of cutter patrols from other points on the East and Gulf coasts will give smugglers an open field.

Coast Guard officials report that their informants say that a large ocean-going ship, laden with several hundred pounds of marijuana and cocaine, traversed a route from Colombia all the way up the East Coast to a destination in Maine. It totally avoided detection by the depleted Coast Guard patrols. One Coast Guard spokesman explained that it was very easy for such ships to avoid the massed fleet off Florida, since the Cuban refugee patrols generally hug the coastline and go over a 90-100 mile radius within the areas of the straits; any ship that goes into international waters can escape the fleet.

Even if they happen to cross paths, the Coast Guard is so overworked on refugee patrols that it is doubtful that they they would deploy to do anything.

New routes

Drug Enforcement Agency spokesmen report that the Miami illegal drug rings are now mapping new routes to take advantage of the Carter administration's misdeployment of the Coast Guard.

U.S. to drugs

a "low priority" by Transportation Secretary Goldschmidt (right).

Drug-carrying ships will now go through the Yucatan Channel, through the Gulf of Mexico to the Houston area. Numbers of Houston's custom officials normally assigned to monitor drug trafficking, have been sent to Florida to work on the refugee problem.

Another possible route would deposit drugs in the Tampa area. Other routes go up the East Coast, heading for Boston, Cape Cod and Maine.

Coast Guard officials contacted by this news service expressed alarm and disgust with the apparent inability of the Carter administration to understand the seriousness of the drug inflow and how administration actions are making things worse.

These observers, who have watched the Carter administration systematically cripple and destroy all drug enforcement efforts, know that such actions are not merely incompetent.

International

World Bank aids drugs in Latin America

The biggest drug pushers in the world are not in the "Golden Triangle" of Southeast Asia, nor in Colombia, South America, nor are they the "French Connection." They are to be found in Washington, D.C., housed in the shared headquarters of the world's two largest international financial institutions, the World Bank and the International Monetary fund.

Through deliberately excessive loan "conditionalities" imposed on Third World countries, these two institutions have caused the enforcement of brutal austerity policies which have gutted those nations' economies and forced them to turn to drug production on a massive scale.

IMF/World Bank policies have a two-fold purpose: (1) the conversion of the underdeveloped Third World into marijuana, coca and poppy farms, whose lucrative revenues would go to fill IMF/World Bank coffers in the form of debt repayment and (2) the saturation of the United States with drugs.

To achieve that second goal, the U.S. "pot lobby" has a clear strategy. According to a spokesman for the Washington, D.C.-based National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML), "If enough of these (Third World) countries go with (drug) legalization, the United States may perceive the more enlightened trend and get the idea."

The campaign to force Third World countries to legalize drug cultivation and export is not new. Two years ago, a World Bank senior official for Latin America declared:

"I haven't looked at Colombia's drug industry, although I've just returned from Bolivia, and I know that the coca industry there is highly advantageous to producers. In fact, from their point of view, they simply couldn't find a better product. Its advantages are that no elaborate technology is required, no hybrid seeds, the land and climate are perfect. . . ."

And, according to an IMF officer for Colombia: "(Marijuana production) would not destroy the national economy. From an economic viewpoint, the marijuana is just a crop, like any other. It brings in foreign exchange, and provides income for the peasants."

Colombia

The Colombian "pot lobby"—which closely coordinates its legalization strategy with the United States marijuana lobby—has scored major successes in the past months. The government of Turbay Ayala was seriously weakened by the M-19 terrorist incident in Bogota which gave the upper hand to domestic and international "human rights" forces that largely overlap the legalization drive.

• In early March, Defense Minister Camacho Leyva withdrew 3,500 trained antidrug troops from the Guajira Peninsula, Colombia's illicit drug plantation, ostensibly to redeploy the troops to the terrorist-occupied Dominican Embassy in Bogota. In reality there had been intense pressure from forces as diverse as the ex-chief of the secret police, Jose Joaquin Matelana, and the liberal financier Ernesto Samper Pizano, who pleaded that the troops should be removed from a "dangerous source of corruption" in the lucrative drug trafficking zone. The troop withdrawal was hailed by Samper Pizano as "de fact legalization."

• Last month, the Colombian press revealed that Hector Echeverri Correa, president of the Colombian Senate and an open advocate of marijuana legalization, planned to introduce a bill into the Colombian Congress to legalize cultivation and export of marijuana and cocaine. The bill has since been accepted for debate.

• In early May, the Colombian Supreme Court decreed the legalization of a "personal dose" of marijuana and hashish. An addition to the decree permits an individual possessing more than the legal one ounce to divide his stash into several "legal" shares for "addicted" family members or friends. One legal expert pointed out that with doctored medical evidence, Colombian traffickers could transport substantial amounts of drugs with ease.

• Last week, the Turbay government decided not to use the herbicide paraquat to eradicate the marijuana fields covering large chunks of Colombian territory. The technical commission recommending disapproval claimed that drug production was a "social phenomenon" that could not be eradicated by paraquat—exactly the line of the pot lobby.

Legalization of drugs in Colombia violates the 1961 United Nations Resolution on Psychotropic Substances which prohibits commerce in marijuana, hashish and narcotic drugs. It would set a precedent for countries like . . .

Jamaica

This poverty-stricken island-nation is the classic case of a country driven to the brink of economic disintegration by the IMF, while pro-IMF forces inside Jamaica openly promote the legalization of marijuana production and export as the answer to the country's problems.

Under the current Michael Manley government, which opposes drug legalization, the IMF's austerity dictates have already collapsed tangible production on the island for lack of credit, driven most basic consumer goods out of the purchasing reach of the majority, and triggered mass employment.

Enter the "opposition," the Jamaican Labor Party which is on the best of terms with the international banking community. Its "solution": legalize marijuana. That's the JLP's platform for the general elections later this year.

JLP general secretary Bruce Golding says "ganja (marijuana) has become a way of life here" and boasts of a resolution before parliament sponsored by a JLP deputy leader seeking to decriminalize the drug. And as Hugh O'Shaughnessy, Latin American columnist for the London Financial Times admitted in an unusually candid article April 6, "the International Monetary Fund is now effectively . . . helping those who want to legalize pot" in Jamaica.

Peru

The so-called "Peruvian Miracle" which enabled this Andean region nation to go from near default on its international debts in 1976 to a "stabilized" repayment situation today is a classical IMF recipe. Under the most drastic austerity conditions, this nation has turned to its only "growth industry"—cocaine—to meet IMF demands.

While national wages are estimated at one-third 1973 levels, industrial production has all but ground to a halt and 60 percent of Lima's population is considered undernourished. The area under cocoa plant cultivation in Peru has gone from 5,000 to 68,000 hectares in the past few years.

A legalized drug trade is not openly under consideration (many say it is merely "unnecessary" at this time). But the legalization over a year ago of gambling casinos in Peru's drug-saturated border towns has provided the ideal means for laundering drug money.

Should neighboring Colombia go with drug legalization, the cocaine trade of both Peru and Bolivia would be de facto legalized, as Colombia is the acknowledged refining and transshipment point for that drug.

Int'l pot lobby meets in U.K.

On April 12 and 13 in Sheffield, England dope freaks from at least four nations convened to plan the next stages of their campaign to legalize mind-stupefying drugs. The meeting was sponsored by the Legalize Cannabis campaign—Britain's counterpart to the U.S.-based National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws.

One NORML representative, Bob Possony, was reportedly at the meeting, as well as representatives from Australia (recently identified as a new plantation site for marijuana-growing in the British Commonwealth) and leaders of the Berlin-based West German dope group, InHale (Initiative for Hashish Legalization).

A few years ago, such a meeting would have been considered a fringe gathering. Incredibly, however, these groups and others, operating under an umbrella called the International Cannabis Association for Reform (ICAR), have succeeded in gaining official observer status at the United Nations in New York.

The political credo of ICAR, now firmly entrenched in New York, is the internationalization of the work that the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws through the help of such institutions as the Ford Foundation-created Drug Abuse Council and the Carter administration has been attempting to spread for the last five years. ICAR stands for: full legalization of all cannabis drugs including marijuana, hashish, hash oil, and other derivatives; removal of all international sanctions and cooperation among nations against drug trafficking, and revocation of the 1961 Single Convention on Psychotropic Drugs, which set up international agreements to work against traffic in marijuana products, synthetic hallucinogens and heroin.

At an international conference last December in Amsterdam, members of ICAR met to plan their coordinated initiatives. At the meeting were NORML, InHale, and Britain's Legalize Cannabis Campaign (LCC). Observers at the meeting also report a heavy representation of "direct action" groups involved in antinuclear politics as well as drugs. While the proposal to use the drug movement as a terrorist international was officially rejected in Amsterdam, further investigation reveals that this already, de facto, is the case.

The relatively unknown Yippie organization which publishes an infrequent pornographic rag called Overthrow is composed of the leftovers of the followers of 1968 rioters, fugitive Abbie Hoffman and Chicago Seven defendant Jerry Rubin.

Operating through offshoots like "Rock Against Racism," the Yippies have gained some attention for their pranks such as marijuana smoke-ins on the White House lawn and throwing pies at political figures they oppose.

Yippies are also on the staff of High Times magazine, the dopers' bible, which includes in its monthly edition an international "stock market quote" style feature on the price, quality, and availability of, marijuana and hashish around the world.

Two Yippie chapters are worth noting—British LCC, sponsor of last weekend's London meeting, and Open Road, a publication based in Vancouver, B.C. which is run by several known terrorist operatives. Through its editor Helene Ellenbogen, Open Road has direct ties to West Germany's Baader-Meinhof gang and the violent wing of German environmentalists who staged bloody demonstrations against a nuclear construction site in Brockdorf, West Germany. Open Road is also a safehouse for members of the George Jackson Brigade, which has operated in Washington State and Oregon for the last five years and has two of its members on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list.

A survey of drug bills on Capitol Hill

This month's legislative update will outline existing federal legislation now pending before the Congress. In future columns, each bill will be analyzed in terms of whether its real aim is to aid governmental agencies in the War on Drugs—and how successful the legislation is in that effort.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Introduced by Rep. Billy Lee Evans, Democrat of Georgia.

The bill would increase criminal penalties for possession of over 100 pounds of marijuana.

Introduced by Rep. Billy Lee Evans, Democrat of Georgia.

This bill would allow the Internal Revenue Service to assist the various government enforcement agencies in the investigation of drug trafficking. The various sections of the bill ensure IRS confidentiality of information. The bill would amend or change the Tax Reform Bill of 1976, which was passed through Congress because of alleged government abuse in the use of IRS files.

At this time for example, a drug trafficker could claim $100,000 income from his trade on his tax form with complete confidentiality on the part of IRS. According to a law enforcement agent the Carter administration is preparing its own IRS reform act to counter this bill.

HR 2538

Introduced by Rep. Mario Biaggi, Democrat of New York.

The bill would permit the Coast Guard to pick up drug traffickers outside of U.S. territorial waters. The bill has passed the House and is pending in the Senate Commerce Committee.

HR Bill 5961

Introduced by Rep. John J. Lafalce, Democrat of New York.

The bill would amend the Bank Secrecy Act of 1970, allowing an individual to leave the country with up to $10,000 without declaring it to U.S. Customs. The bill would allow customs agents to pick up and criminally charge drug traffickers with the attempt to take money out of the country without reporting this exit of capital from the country.

At present there is no crime in attempt, thus if no money has left the country, no crime has been committed. The bill also gives customs agents the right to search suspects leaving the United States.

The bill is out of the House Banking Committee and is now before the Ways and Means Committee before going before the full House.

SENATE

S 2402, S 2403, S 2404, S 2405

Introduced by Sen. Sam Nunn, Democrat of Georgia.

This is the same as HR 6767 (see above) sponsored by Rep. Evans in the House.

Introduced by Sen. Edward Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts.

Better known as the Criminal Code Reform Bill, S 1722's section dealing with drug matters would reduce possession of small amounts of marijuana to a misdemeanor. This is federal decriminalization for "personal" possession of marijuana. The bill has gone through the full Judiciary Committee and is now in mark-up stage.

Sen. Charles Mathias, a Republican from Maryland, has introduced an amendment to the Kennedy Criminal Code Bill which would retain the current federal penalties for possession of any amount of marijuana. The current federal penalty is a minimum of one year in jail and $5,000 fine for any amount of the substance. Mathias's amendment has the support of Senators Paul Laxalt of Nevada, Harrison Schmitt of New Mexico, William Armstrong of Colorado, Gordon Humphrey of New Hampshire, and Barry Goldwater of Arizona, all Republicans and Sen. Howard Cannon of Nevada, a Democrat.

The 'sex education' conspiracy—

Christian Curtis rips the covers off "sex education" and finds its backers are the same crowd that created the drug culture. Their purpose: crippling the minds of America's youth.

Homosexuality and animal sodomy are praised as alternative lifestyles in this "Zing" comic book by Sol Gordon, an architect of the New Jersey sex curriculum. Bob Bowen of Citizens for LaRouche shows the evidence to Rev. Alfred C. Maxwell (wearing hat) of the Baptist Ministerial Conference of Newark and other representatives of a coalition to pass a bill to strike down the mandate who gathered at the Trenton State House May 19.

According to an April 8 mandate from the New Jersey Board of Education, every school district in the state is to begin adopting "sex education" curricula by no later than 1983. And New Jersey is only a test case. Unless this dictate is reversed, it will set a nationwide precedent for destroying the minds and morality of American children. From the documents of the authors of the compulsory program, here is what your child will be "taught":

- Children 5 to 6 years of age will learn the names of the "proper parts" of the reproductive organs. They will be taught to "recognize" these parts of the body by applying life-sized cutouts of sexual organs to silhouettes, so that the child can define the silhouette as a "girl" or a "boy."

- Slightly older elementary school students will be told to "inspect themselves" with mirrors. They will be shown films of dogs copulating, counterposed with a scene of a human couple embracing in bed. The narrator of this film, already in use in some districts, tells the students, "Your parents are doing what the dogs do."

- At ages 11 and 12, children will be taught about masturbation—not only what it is, but how it's done.

- Thirteen- and 14-year-olds will be presented with homosexuality and prostitution as "alternative lifestyles." One of the sex program textbooks, Random House's Life and Health, which is already used in the county of North Brunswick, cites "expert" opinion that if it were not for social taboo, most people would be bisexual. As for prostitution, the book suggests, "It is not easy to define a prostitute. Who should be included in the definition? The person who has coitus with an employer to gain promotions and salary increases? The wife who holds out for a mink coat?"

- By the senior year of high school, students will have covered bisexuality, transsexuality, transvestism, pornography, and such specialized topics as "the effect of penis size" on the female partner's satisfaction during intercourse, according to one program already in place. In one New Jersey high school, parents discovered that students are already being shown various types of condoms—colored red, white, and blue to mark the Bicentennial.

These "courses," many of which are already being put into practice, are not the mere perversions of misguided liberal educators who may have gone "too far." Nor is what is at stake in New Jersey and the rest of the country limited to the question of whether or not "sex education should be taught in the home or in the schools." The real issue is much more profound and concerns the very survival of our society. For these curricula, as this report will show, are deliberately designed to destroy your child's mind and all standards of morality.

Legalized pornography in our schools is not "just happening." It is a calculated attack on American youth, and most importantly, it is being carried out by the same people and agencies responsible for bringing the drug plague, the counterculture, zombie cults, and terrorism upon the United States.

brainwashing by perversion

It's not sex education

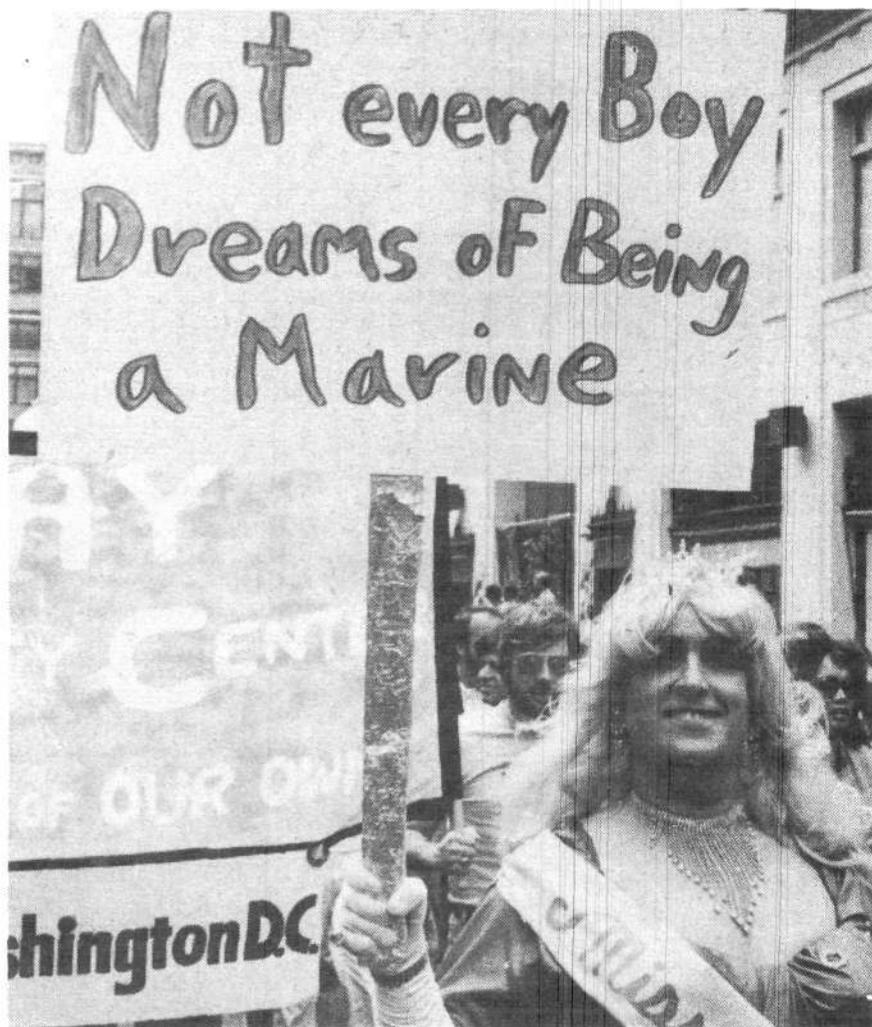

If such a conclusion "sounds incredible," it is not for lack of evidence to back it up. Rather, it is because the average American, regardless of his or her shortcomings, has difficulty understanding that someone can be so purely evil.

But a close look at who and what are really behind "sex education" reveals an evil purpose beyond the most frightening nightmares of the average citizen.

First, let's get rid of the idea that the curricula represented by what is being pushed in New Jersey have anything to do with sex "education." The subject of sex is merely used as a handle for getting into the child's mind. The immediate effect of the types of manipulation described above, especially on the youngest children, is clear. Sexual characteristics become the yardstick for identifying other people, and, most importantly, themselves. The child is taught to believe that his identity as a human being is based on his sensual appetites.

For example, the architects of the Jersey program plan to have grade-school children from kindergarten on wear "I.D." cards in class that identify areas of sensual and emotional concern. On the card will be the child's attitude toward his parents and names of places the child associates with different "feelings" (e.g., a place where the individual was "extremely happy" at one time). Also displayed will be a qualifying word describing how the child "feels about himself." Later, children will be given questionnaires—to be discussed in class—asking for such data as how the students "feels" about the opposite sex. One demand states, "Name three ways you can make members of the opposite sex like you."

By the high school level, these questions become: "Do you like to touch and be touched?" "Do you like others of your own sex" and "Can you accept occasional sessions of unsatisfactory sex without blaming yourself or your partner?" These queries are already given to Jersey students in one high test, under the title of "intimacy test."

The bottom line is to get the child to focus on what "feels good." Morality gets replaced with obsession over "my inner psychological needs" and sense gratification. If it feels good, that's all that matters. Hence one New Jersey pamphlet proposed for the curriculum urges students not to worry about masturbation, but to "enjoy" it. The only disadvantages the authors could sarcastically think of are getting "stains on your teddy bear" or going without food and water during "marathon masturbation sessions."

The goal of destroying morality was best summed up recently by Sol Gordon of Syracuse University, speaking before the New Jersey state school board. The objective of the curriculum, Gordon stated, is to teach children "an appreciation for the whole range of sexuality, that sexual expression is not limited to heterosexual, genital intercourse."

Mr. Gordon, one of the architects of the Jersey program, is an open advocate of animal sodomy. He is the publisher of Zing comic books, which are distributed to schools by Planned Parenthood of America. Zing heroes include "Captain VeeDee-O" and "Wanda Lust," who carry on their exploits in such places as "Mt. Vulva." In one issue not long ago, two students are depicted eyeing a caged parrot. "Wow, I could really go for that bird," one student says. The bird responds, "Ya wanna?" and the other lad remarks, "Far out."

A case in point

Where does this kind of morality-destroying "education" lead? Let's look briefly at the case of the deranged terrorist cult from Philadelphia called MOVE.

In July 1978 the MOVE engaged in a shootout with Philadelphia police that left one officer dead. When the smoke cleared, authorities found a commune swarming with rats and heaped with human excrement. Investigators subsequently discovered that the MOVE was created out of an elaborate "psychological experiment" under the direction of Dr. Eric Trist of the University of Pennsylvania, the American Friends Service Committee, and an AFSC offshoot called the Movement for a New Society (MNS). One of the key components of the behavior modification/brainwashing program used to recruit zombies into the MOVE was "sex education," including pederasty.

In 1977 the MNS published a "training manual" for its members. Its instructions include:

"Learn eroticism from children: notice how babies experience their sensibility from head to foot. That potential is still there for adults too. When cuddling children, include their genitals. . . ."

A more recent MNS manual urges:

"Masturbate in front of a mirror. . . . Masturbate with a friend or lover present. Share information. . . . Work on your feelings of dislike and fear of gayness. We must deal with them. . . . Set a goal of making love to someone of the same sex within a certain time. . . . Make it happen."

Sound familiar? It's a slightly more straightforward version of the proposed New Jersey "sex education" curriculum.

WHO YOUR ENEMY IS

The criminals trying to destroy your children are known. Their names are public. They often occupy positions of great power and prestige in our society. And they have been patiently at work in their evil enterprise for decades. We shall introduce them here, and we will see that they form a self-acknowledged conspiracy consciously trying to destroy the United States.

They hate everything this country was founded upon—scientific and technological progress, cultural and moral advancement, sanity, and reason. They are cultists, mystics, sick leftovers from the Dark Ages who demand a halt to all forms of growth. And we will see that the people pushing sex education and those pushing drugs are one and the same.

The sex education "movement" is merely one part—although a crucial one—of what these evil people themselves now call the "Aquarian conspiracy." We will look at the history of this subversive cancer in our midst, a history that involves well-known British aristocratic families, United Nations "one-worlders," misnamed

"Humanists," and an assortment of institutes specializing in brainwashing.

What is being sold to you as "sex education" is really a form of behavior modification called sensitivity training. Sensitivity training, for its part, was developed as a form of mind subversion parallel with the introduction on a mass scale of hallucinogens, particularly LSD, into the United States since World War II. Both drugs and sensitivity training produce essentially the same types of brainwashing symptoms in their victims. Both are aspects of one subversive effort to corrode the morality of our youth.

The drug epidemic that has afflicted this country since the 1960s was the deliberate creation of something called the MK-Ultra Project. Back in the late 1920s, a group of perverse British doctors, psychologists, and anthropologists implanted the seeds of the drug subculture with a string of communes in California. From there, these conspirators, who included such well-known personalities as Julian and Aldous Huxley, Gregory Bateson, Margaret Mead, and H.G. Wells, recruited agents and founded institutions around the spreading of drug-consuming cults.

In the late 1930s, Dr. Albert

Aldous Huxley

Who were the Huxley brothers?

Aldous and Julian Huxley, both members of the drug and sex cult known as the Order of the Golden Dawn, were the "intellectuals" of the decadent British aristocracy during the first half of this century. Aldous, the science fiction-futurology freak, wrote Brave New World as a scenario for what the swinging lords and ladies of the old nobility planned to do with the civilized world—turn it into a nightmare of zero growth and dictatorship. Aldous led Project MK-Ultra, the operation that smuggled LSD into the United States and eventually created the rock-drug counterculture.

Julian, a Darwinian biologist and founder of UNESCO, was the expert in sexual perversions. A close friend of sexologist Dr. Kinsey, he once described his visit to Kinsey's secret archives on perversions as one of the high points of his life. Julian was not a very stable character, suffering eight nervous breakdowns during his life. After spending years eavesdropping on the mating habits of innumerable species of animals, Julian wrote that no animal was as capable of sexual deviance as is man.

Hofmann of Sandoz Laboratories in Switzerland and an associate of MK-Ultra, invented LSD and brought it to California. After years of "experiments" at the Palo Alto Mental Research Institute, the Stanford Research Institute, and the Esalen Institute, among others, MK-Ultra "went big" with mass distribution of LSD in the 1960s through the project's agents, Timothy Leary and Ken Kesey.

The names behind MK-Ultra's drug running are the same names that established sensitivity training and sex education curricula in this country. Sensitivity training was brought into the United States in 1946 from the Tavistock Institute in England by Dr. Kurt Lewin, who set up the National Training Laboratories. Lewin's brainwashing technique, which according to congressional testimony by U.S. military officers was identical to what the Chinese did to U.S. prisoners during the Korean War, was based on getting the individual to focus on his senses. By the 1950s and early 1960s, this technique had been established at the Esalen Institute and at several clinics based around Palo Alto, California—the same institutes then engaged in MK-Ultra.

Overseeing both projects—sex and drugs—were the Huxley brothers. Aldous was considered the "father" of MK-Ultra, while Julian was the founding director of UNESCO at the United Nations. As we shall see, almost all of the current trends in "sex education" curricula were inspired by Julian Huxley's UNESCO while Aldous Huxley was conducting LSD experiments in California.

British degenerates

The Huxleys come from what we would today call the Jet Set of British high society during the early part of this century. These were the "free sex," mate-swapping, and sodomy circles of decadent British aristocratic families and their hangers-on. The cream of this avant garde, such as Lord Bertrand Russell, the Huxleys, George Orwell (author of 1984), kook futurologist H.G. Wells, and the celebrated transvestite Aleister Crowley, were members of the sado-masochistic drug cult called the Order of the Golden Dawn. A close friend and sexual playmate of the Order was Margaret Sanger, the founder of Planned Parenthood of America.

This network of morally deranged aristocrats openly pronounced their intention of spreading insanity and perversion throughout the world—especially to the United States. Their blueprint was Aldous Huxley's Brave New World, a vision of how this elite would impose its insanity through fascism.

Carefully, they built up their movement in the United States, through a combination of internal subversion and "international" pressure for adopting certain "reforms." Under the guise of what was called the Humanist Movement, their agent John Dewey planted the seeds of destruction in the American educational system, while the "one-worlders" around Julian Huxley built the United Nations.

With the establishment of the U.N., the conspirators of insanity used the argument of "international consensus" to bolster their attack on the United States. They talked of a "global community," a

Russell: 'catch the patient young'

Lord Bertrand Russell, the bisexual darling of the British aristocracy and associate of the Huxley brothers, laid out the eventual aims of sensitivity training/sex education almost 30 years ago in his book, The Impact of Science on Society. "Mass Psychology," or brainwashing, is the key to the future, he said.

It is hoped that in time anybody will be able to persuade anybody of anything, if he can catch the patient young. . . . Various results will soon be arrived at. First, the influence of home is obstructive. Second, that not much can be done unless indoctrination begins before the age of ten. Third, that verses set to music and repeatedly intoned are very effective. Fourth, that the opinion that snow is white must be held to show a morbid taste for eccentricity. . . . It is for future scientists to make these maxims precise and discover exactly how much it costs per head to make children believe that snow is black, and how much less it would cost to make them believe it is dark gray.

Although this science will be diligently studied, it will be rigidly confined to the governing class. The populace will not be allowed to know how its convictions were generated.

Like Russell, the "educators" of the Aquarian conspiracy—called "change agents" in the trade—freely recognize that the influence of healthy parents is their greatest obstacle. A study on educational "trends" for the 1970s stated:

Basic personality patterns may have been formed before children ever enter school. They can be changed but the later that is postponed, the more difficult is the process.

Rand Corporation consultant Dr. R. Gary Bridge put it this way: "When kids come to us at age four, five or six, they already have these beliefs set. We have to unwind them and start over, and even then, we get them only a few hours a day."

"global ecosystem," and "limited sovereignty." The idea was to impose on this country, in the name of "scarce resources," protecting the "environment," and international "human rights," the notion that the age of progress was coming to an end.

The so-called Humanists, meanwhile, implanted themselves in American society through such agencies as the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies. It is not incidental that the American Friends Service Committee, the agency that helped create the Philadelphia MOVE cult mentioned earlier, is closely coordinated with Aspen in projects concerning environmentalism and "human rights."

The intensified campaign for sex education since the 1960s comes directly out of Julian Huxley's UNESCO. The very term most preferred by child molesters when referring to sex education—"family-life education"—was coined by a UNESCO study overseen by Huxley himself in 1963, UNESCO's "International Year of the Child."

The SIECUS story

UNESCO generated something called the Sex Information and Education Council of the U.S., or SIECUS, probably the one institution most responsible for perversion in U.S. schools during the past 16 years. SIECUS was active in almost every state of the Union, testing citizens' reactions to proposals that eventually paved the way for today's curricula. On the founding board of directors of SIECUS in 1964 were four of the nine members of the UNESCO Family-Life Education committee from the year before. Three of the other SIECUS board members, including chairman Dr. Mary Calderone, were former high-level officials of the U.N. World Health Organization.

SIECUS, having done its pioneering work admirably, is now a discarded shell. Its functions have been taken over by the much larger and more "respectable," multi-million-dollar Planned Parenthood

The big names behind SIECUS

The following patrons attended the second annual SIECUS dinner back in the 1960s:

Hugh Hefner: lord of the Playboy empire; the Playboy Foundation is a major sponsor of sex education and marijuana "decriminalization."

John Cowles: publisher of Look magazine; Look's Senior Editor for the West Coast at the time was George Leonard, who was also vice president of the Esalen Institute. Esalen not only did "studies" for the sex education movement, but was instrumental in the promotion of LSD through MK-Ultra.

Robert McNamara: president of the World Bank. The World Bank informally urges underdeveloped countries to cultivate marijuana and other drugs as "cash crops."

Stewart Mott: heir to General Motors and now the major financial backer of the prodrug, environmentalist Citizens Party and John Anderson.

Steven Rockefeller: member of the notorious family that has long been promoting zero growth.

James Warburg: Wall Street banker from the infamous Warburg family of financiers. During the 1930s, the Warburgs conducted money to Hitler's Nazis.

SIECUS and the porno industry

One interesting gentleman who served as an adviser to SIECUS during the late 1960s and early 1970s was a Dr. Albert Ellis, who headed the kook Institute for Rational Living. Dr. Ellis is cited as an authoritative sexologist in the Parsippany, New Jersey 1969 teachers' guide on sex education, published by the Parsippany Board of Education. He was known as an advocate of anything that "feels good," and once said that if he were stranded on a desert island with his sister, he'd have sexual relations with her. Not surprisingly, the good doctor was also listed as a staff member of Screw magazine.

sex lobby of Julian Huxley's friend, the late Margaret Sanger. One of SIECUS's former big bank-rollers, the Ford Foundation, now pumps millions into Planned Parenthood.

SIECUS was also directly tied to the MK-Ultra LSD program during its heyday. One of its founders during the 1960s was the Pacifica Foundation in California, which was also putting money into Gregory Bateson's LSD experiments in Palo Alto. LSD guru Timothy Leary lived off of Pacifica money for years. Similarly, the Esalen Institute, another MK-Ultra center, provided sex education "consultants" to SIECUS. Wealthy SIECUS patrons included Hugh Hefner, Robert McNamara, and Steven Rockefeller.

Beneath these "daddy bigbucks" were the actual operatives of SIECUS. Besides a few assorted smut peddlers, such as Dr. Calderone's husband, Frank, who owned two porno movie theaters on Long Island, New York, and another advisor who was on the staff of Screw magazine (see box), there was Dr. F. Brock Chisholm. Chisholm, director of the World Health Organization prior to joining SIECUS, was a former military psychological warfare specialist trained at the Tavistock Institute, the agency that developed sensitivity training. Chisholm stated in 1946 that "the basis of child training" is "the reinterpretation and eventually eradication of the concept of right and wrong."

And in New Jersey . . .

Now that we have met the founders of sex education and their institutions, let's look at who their descendants are and what they are involved in today. Take the case of New Jersey.

Mrs. Catherine White Ellison heads the Educational Foundation for Human Sexuality at Montclair State College, the institute that is coordinating the design and promulgation of the Jersey sex education curriculum. Mrs. Ellison got her sensitivity training at the University of California at Berkeley and at the Mental Research Institute in Palo Alto—the same Palo Alto outfit that ran MK-Ultra.

The person on the state school board who led the effort to pass a sex education mandate was Mrs. Susan Wilson. Mrs. Wilson is also no local housewife. She is a member of the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies—the same organization that sprang out of the Huxley brothers' so-called Humanist Movement.

In fact, today's "sex education" conspiracy has branched out to brainwash children with "drug education" and "death studies"—all based on the same principle of destroying morality. The National Institute of Mental Health, a quasi-governmental agency founded by Dr. Chisholm's World Health Organization, published a guide in 1969 entitled How To Plan a Drug Abuse Workshop for Teachers. The introduction stresses, "At all grades, a factual, non-moralizing presentation is essential. . . . Diametric 'good' and 'bad' approaches are not helpful to drug education." Teachers are urged to immerse students in "high degree sensory stimulation" such as "records, tapes and TV at high volumes . . . psychedelic lights—perhaps simultaneously. . . . Enjoyment of the stimulation and inundation of sound, sight, words, or lyrics, and of kinetic activity ("dancing"—ed.) can be contrasted with unstimulating activities of the classroom."

Simultaneously, organizations such as the Aspen Institute and National Training Laboratories are teaching children to accept "death with dignity"—a polite term for murder against elderly citizens. One of the texts now in use is a pamphlet called "Moral Reasoning," published by the Xerox Corporation in 1972. Included among the stories designed for "discussion" is an essay about a shipwreck, where there are not enough lifeboats for the survivors and decisions must be made as to who is to die. Another entry, entitled "Too Old To Keep Alive," details how primitive Eskimos commit geriatricide against their elderly, and calls on students to consider the case. Ironically, the text also contains an article that polemicalizes against the killing of baby seals.

"Carry on subversively"

Is this entire movement—sex education, drugs, sensitivity, training, death education—really a conspiracy? Do the people in-

Out of the closet, into the gov't

The sex merchants who began their subversion from private "think tanks" and under the cover of the United Nations have fully infiltrated the federal government. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare, which was set up by the UNESCO-WHO crew, is one of the largest pornography outlets in the country. In 1978 the HEW sponsored a "Sex Fair" in Atlanta. Every type of deviation was portrayed at the various "booths," including homosexuality, masturbation, adultery, and group sex. Some of these were acted out by a "living theater" troop of high school students from the Family Life Theater of New York, which was set up by Planned Parenthood of America. According to witnesses, children as young as 8 years old were shown how to use contraceptives by such techniques as having vaginal foam squirted into the palms of their hands. Attendance by children was encouraged by charging only $2 admission; adults had to pay $50.

volved know that it's subversive? Read what one member of this movement had to say in the 1971 issue of School Review magazine:

"Our efforts as educators must not be directed to restoring the past order of morality but to participating in creating a new one. . . . When it is shed there will be a new moral order to take its place . . . a counterculture that will burst through to the surface. Perhaps one can establish cells of a counterculture in the classroom. . . . Such units would then . . . contribute to the disintegration of existing institutions.

"Formal education carried on subversively . . . provides some measure of the physical and social isolation necessary for the incubation process."

The Spring 1975 issue of the Journal of Teacher Education briefs instructors in this conspiracy on how to keep their work secret and deceive the public:

"Keep the door closed. . . . The successful teacher innovates quietly and without fanfare.

"Use a special vocabulary. . . . Avoid change, fun, new, sensitivity . . . Publicly stress instead mastering basics, students' responsibility, hard work, respect, traditional values, proven, discipline, and results.

"Carry a book around. . . . You appear to know what you are doing."

The National Training Laboratories similarly cautioned subversive agents in a 1977 newsletter:

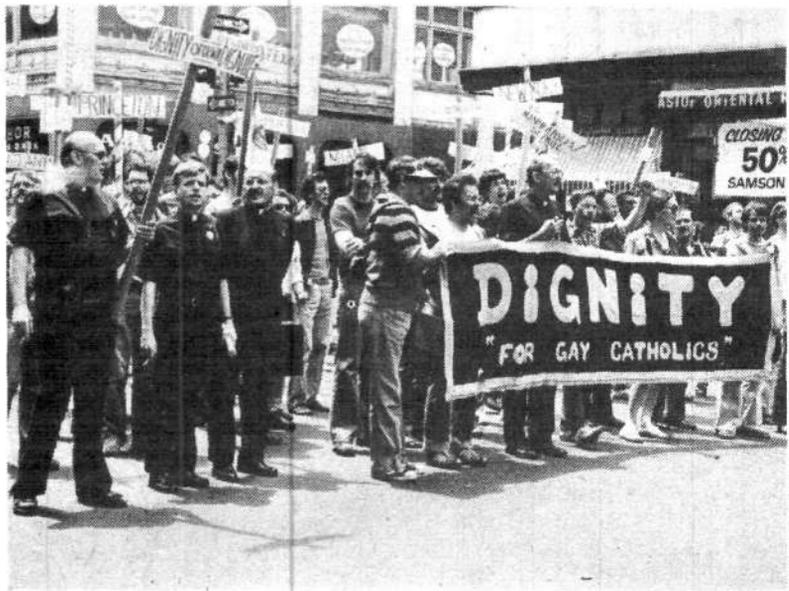

"The more visible change is, the more threatening it becomes, and the more it will be resented.

"Couch the language of change in the language of the status quo.

"Use the stated objectives of the status quo. They are almost broad enough to encompass innovation.

"Unobtrusively change one unit; the innovation, if successful, will spread."

Are such "innovations" being introduced into your child's school? And are you being told, like New Jersey parents, that "no one else" objects?

Does the New Jersey Conference of Catholic Bishops also support "gay rights," like this contingent at a New York parade in June, 1979? Many New Jersey Catholics are asking how far the betrayal of their bishops will go before the Vatican cracks down.

The bishop of Sodom and Gomorrah

Why does Peter Gerety, the Archbishop of Newark, support drugs, homosexuality and promiscuity? This is a question being asked by many New Jersey Catholics who have found their archbishop acting contrary to the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church. Some Catholic groups are reportedly petitioning the Vatican for the removal of this "bishop of Sodom and Gomorrah."

- It was the New Jersey Conference of Catholic Bishops, which Gerety heads, that defeated a bill in the state assembly which would have stopped the infamous "sex education" mandate of the Board of Education. Lawyer Elmer Matthews testified on behalf of the Bishops' Conference that the Catholic Church of New Jersey "enthusiastically" supports the mandate.

- The newspaper of Archbishop Gerety's archdiocese, the Advocate, supported the sex education mandate last February, even before the pornographic contents of the program were revealed in the Newark Star-Ledger.

- The Conference of Bishops is also on record for drug decriminalization. Bishop Francis of Newark, a protégé of Gerety, was actively campaigning for marijuana decrim in 1979.

- Archbishop Gerety is a sponsor of the "charismatic" revival movement that is perverting the institutions of the Church. He cosponsored a 30,000 person mass brainwashing session at New Jersey's Meadowlands park in May, 1978. On May 24, 1980 he cosponsored with Episcopalian Bishop Spong 200 "charismatic" meetings around the state. Gerety is attempting to institutionalize such practices in Roman Catholicism through his fight for general absolution services currently forbidden by the Pope.

New York State tried to stop it. The Federal Reserve Board, the nation's highest monetary authority, couldn't enforce it. But the Carter administration, through G. William Miller's Treasury Department, brought the world's biggest dope financiers into a commanding position in American banking. When the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation took control of New York's $13 billion Marine Midland Bank in February 1980, the Carter administration ended a bitter two-year fight to keep Hong Kong's infamous dope bankers out of America.

Carter's officials left a trail of broken arms and torn-up laws stretching from the paneled offices of the Federal Reserve to state legislatures around the country. Despite the public protests of New York State officials and legislators, the Treasury handed control of New York's Marine Midland Bank, one of the nation's largest—violating its own published rules of conduct in the process!

All this occurred in the public view, debated in open hearings and in the public press. When you wonder why the White House can't get the dope off the streets, consider what the dope in the White House is doing.

Since its founding by Britain's chief banking families in 1864, the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation—known locally as "HongShang"—has been the central bank of the world narcotics traffic, as well as the central bank of Hong Kong, the world narcotics capital. HongShang's headquarters in the British Crown Colony of Hong Kong processes $10 billion in opium revenues each year. But its role is far more important than the link to the Far East ("Golden Triangle") narcotics traffic or the Mideast opium fields. The bank is also the center of a worldwide network of dirty money operations, illegal gold trading, diamond smuggling, and assassination.

Carter's Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board knew this a year before HongShang succeeded in grabbing Marine Midland. In a special November 1978 hearing before the chief bank regulators and lawyers of the Federal Reserve, Dope Inc. co-author Konstandinos Kalimtgis and this writer presented four hours' worth of documentation about HongShang, backed by a 125-page brief. What is more, through the 50,000-copy best-seller Dope, Inc. and a nationwide campaign by the National Anti-Drug Coalition, the facts were also in the hands of state legislators, state banking regulators, the press, and the public.

The National Anti-Drug Coalition's efforts barricaded the takeover attempt for a year and a half, until the Treasury Department itself got into the act, and bulldozed opposition by New York State and other officials. How this occurred is one of the biggest black marks in the blotched record of this administration.

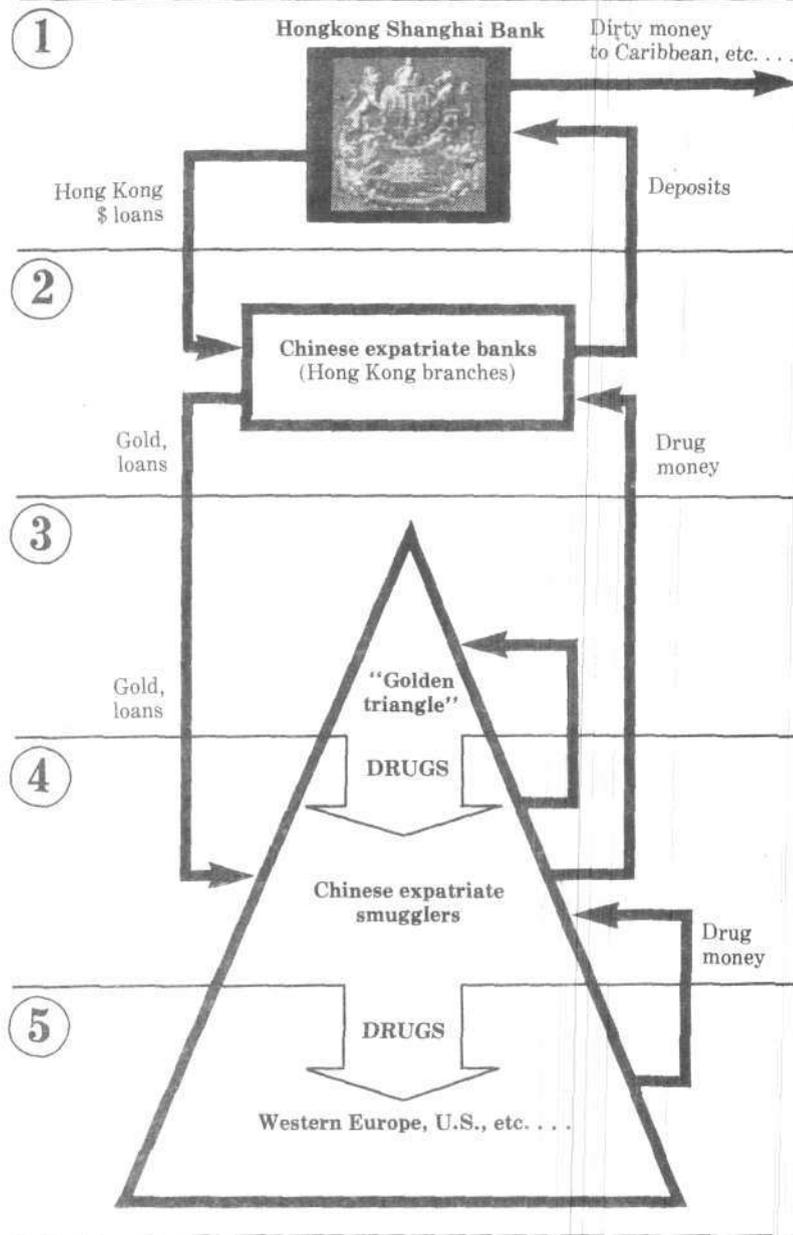

Money too bulky

Any law enforcement official will tell you that the one weakness of the dope traffic is illegal money flows. No matter how much dope the police seize from peddlers, new supplies will replace them. Couriers and peddlers are expendable and replaceable.

But the $100 billion annual sales volume of dope in the United States is harder to hide than that. In small bills, currency worth the $15 billion and up retail price of heroin sold in American streets is bulkier than the heroin itself! This money must be filtered into illegal bank accounts, invested into negotiable securities or precious metals, and transferred abroad to finance additional production, refining, and transport of dope, in a complex international process of exchange.

That is the weak point of the dope trade's protective coloration. Nothing is more controllable than currency flows. Federal regulations make any cash deposit over $10,000 subject to reporting by the bank accepting it. Anti-hijacking measures make it impossible to

The Hongkong and Shanghai Control of Expatriate Drug Trade

The Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, self-described as a "monument to British finance in Asia," is in full control of the Hong Kong money market (1), on which such Chinese expatriate institutions (2) as the Bank of Bangkok absolutely depend for rediscounting loans, etc. Opium smugglers and wholesalers (3) in turn depend on the expatriate banks to finance their barter-purchase, refining and transport of opium and heroin from the "Golden Triangle" peasants of Southeast Asia and China's Yunan Province (4). From seed money to dirty money, the proceeds of the drug trade start and finish with the HongShang.

take a suitcase full of cash onto a commercial airliner. For that matter, America's National Security Agency monitors all international wire transfers of money. There is no way to hide $100 billion—or the $200 billion of international dope trade revenues—without the connivance of major banking institutions.

Imagine every supermarket in the country trying to hide its entire sales revenue from the Internal Revenue Service and other government agencies. The idea is ridiculous. But that is precisely what the narcotics traffic does.

HongShang historically crucial

Dope, Inc. exposed the network of illegal money "laundering" that runs from the Resorts International casinos in the Bahamas and Atlantic City, to the Bronfman and Jacobs families' leftover Prohibition networks, to the gold dealers of London and the diamond dealers of New York City. This network has had a central bank since it first began operating in the United States; that central bank is the HongShang.

Contrary to first impressions, the dope trade requires a central bank like no other form of illegal activity. Production and distribution of heroin is the most tightly-controlled cartel in the world. Peasants in the "Golden Triangle" of Southeast Asia, or in the Middle East, do not plant opium poppies at random. They receive advance financing for a crop of specific size from intermediaries, who must have access to gold, arms, diamonds, and international bank accounts. The price of heroin at street level, the price of uncut kilos of heroin at wholesale level, the price of unrefined gumballs of raw opium are more controlled through the distribution cycle than the world price of oil!

HongShang hearings

Listening quietly and taking notes during the Federal Reserve's first November 1978 hearing on the HongShang while LaRouche aides

Goldman and Kalimtgis presented the facts on the HongShang was the bank's lawyer, Steuert L. Pittman. A former Air Force official, Pittman had created the Office of Preparedness during the Kennedy administration, a virtual government inside the government. By the time the HongShang case came before the Federal Reserve, Pittman's old agency had become the Federal Emergency Management Agency, an octopus reaching inside every Cabinet department.

HongShang had hired one of the key men in Washington's actual behind-the-scenes government. Pittman did not even attempt to respond to the exhaustive documentation against HongShang. Instead, he worked through close contacts, including House Banking Committee Chairman Henry Reuss (D.-Wi.), a prominent supporter of marijuana decriminalization. Another close Pittman colleague from the Kennedy administration was then Treasury Secretary Werner Michael Blumenthal.

New York State officials also heard testimony from the Dope, Inc. co-authors in December 1978. Initially skeptical, New York State's Banking Superintendent Muriel Siebert grew more convinced that something foul was at work the better she got to know HongShang—and the more Dope, Inc. circulated among outraged New York State legislators.

Under banking law, any merger of a state bank with a foreign bank must be approved both by the Federal Reserve and the officials of that state. Superintendent Siebert tried to go about her duties in a run-of-the-mill way, requesting the usual balance sheets from the HongShang, and wound up, to her dismay, with the worst set of cooked books she had ever seen.

As she later told the Treasury officials who approved the HongShang takeover of Marine Midland, "Profits, deposits, and capital are not fairly stated in the published financial statements of Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation." She added, "A glaring example of this is the practice of Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to credit an account called 'Inner Reserves' with the true profit of the bank and then to take from this account the amount of profit that management wants to publish. The secrecy of the true profit is further reinforced by the practice of burying the Inner Reserves Account in the Deposits account." Siebert complained before public hearings that the HongShang would not even tell her what companies it owned, let alone how much profit it made!

New York State's Banking Superintendent Muriel Siebert requested the usual balance sheets from HongShang and wound up, to her dismay, with the worst set of cooked books she had ever seen.

In the transcript of an Oct. 23, 1979 hearing on the HongShang takeover, the record reads:

Question: Would it be possible for an American bank regulator to determine whether or not Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation is still financing narcotics traffic without having access to the type of information that you requested unsuccessfully from the HongShang?

Miss Siebert: No, I could not confirm or deny.

That was enough for New York State, but not for the Federal Reserve. Despite the fact that the Federal Reserve had not obtained any better data than New York State had, and despite the fact that HongShang's own American accountants, Peat Marwick and Mitchell, had quit in disgust the previous July over the same issue, the Fed gave the HongShang takeover of Marine Midland its stamp of approval in March 1979. In its official pronouncement, the Fed admitted that it had conducted no investigation into the charges that HongShang was up to its neck in the dope trade.

Desisted after war?

But New York State was still an obstacle, and the international financial press went crazy over the issue. In February 1979, the leading business magazine Business Week quoted HongShang's response to the charges: the bank had indeed financed the opium trade until the end of World War II, but desisted after that! Of course, the opium heir John Henry Keswick who ran the bank during the period when it admitted running dope—dope that began to flood the United States in the 1920s—is still on the bank's board.

In Washington and elsewhere, the dope money issue simmered just below boiling point. Under the gun, New York State officials tried to pass the buck to Congress. But HongShang lawyer Pittman blocked Congressional hearings with one letter to Banking Committee Chairman Henry Reuss. Pittman's old friend G. William Miller at the Federal Reserve—soon to replace Blumenthal as Secretary of the Treasury—twisted New York State Governor Hugh Carey's arms in an attempt to force approval of the HongShang takeover.

Carey was not hard to persuade. During his gubernatorial election campaign in 1978, he had taken a huge, and illegal, loan from the Bronfman family, the old bootleggers who "went legit" with Seagram Corporation. The scandal that emerged when the loan was reported could have cost him the election. The Bronfmans are the HongShang Bank's chief North American operatives. As Dope, Inc. documents, they run the Hong Kong to Canada opium route that goes through Canadian Pacific and ex-Hong Kong policemen resident in Canada's West Coast.

And the Bronfmans had Carey on a string. The New York State Governor, accordingly, publicly denounced his own banking supervisor's objections to the merger as "invalid" at a May 15, 1979 press conference. He let the press know that if Siebert did not approve the takeover, he would fire her and find a superintendent who would.

But New York State legislators already had outraged constituents at their backs. Tens of thousands of copies of Dope, Inc. were in print, and the facts were too glaring to ignore. Hong Kong is a barren island, first settled in 1837 by British opium traders as a supply depot for the Chinese opium trade. In 1978, its money supply was only $5 billion, yet its banks processed more than $10 billion of illegal opium and heroin revenues. Its police force is the most corrupt in the world, accepting—in the official estimate of the Independent Commission Against Corruption—$1 billion in bribes every year! Every American Congressional investigation on the dope trade has pointed to that British Crown Colony as the center of the financing and distribution of the world's heroin supply.

On top of this sits the HongShang, with half of the island's banking deposits, traditionally controlling the local government. HongShang officially prints the island's currency, the Hong Kong dollar. It is the correspondent bank for every expatriate Chinese or Thai banker in the region, including those detected by the Drug Enforcement Administration as dope financiers. It was created in 1864 for the explicit purpose of financing narcotics traffic and admits such activity up through the end of World War II. The only thing that changed since then, Dope, Inc. documented, is that HongShang employs expendable Ch'ao Chou Chinese frontmen (among others) to handle the dirtier sides of the business. Its empire of transport, shipping, airline, warehousing and chemical companies—the full list of which is still secret—is the physical infrastructure of the opium and heroin trade.

Siebert backed

At stormy hearings held appropriately at the New York State Office Building in Harlem, the Banking Committee of the New York State Legislature backed up the beleaguered Superintendent. The same day, the Independent Bankers Association of New York State demanded, "The continued proliferation of takeovers of U.S. banks and banking holding companies by foreign banks or other foreign interests should be brought to an immediate halt." Backers fearful that they would be next to be taken over by the British financial octopus, including the billion-dollar Long Island Trust, lobbied behind the scenes in Siebert's behalf. The New York State ruling stood: no balance sheet, no approval of the application.

That was in June 1979. But after July 1979, America's political structure had been drastically altered. The Federal Emergency Management Agency slithered into existence that month, immediately taking control over the so-called disaster at the Three Mile Island nuclear plant. FEMA began to run the emergency functions of the Treasury and Federal Reserve, a government within a government. HongShang lawyer Steuert

W. Michael Blumenthal: an old crony of HongShang's lawyer in the cabinet

Pittman, the godfather of the new entity, then pulled a trick that any other administration would have laughed out of court.

Tore up its own rules

In July, Marine Midland, under the new chairmanship of Lehman Brothers partner John Petty, applied to change its charter from state to national status. Under its state charter, Marine Midland's merger with the HongShang was subject to approval by New York State. However, if it changed to a national charter, it could bypass New York State entirely.

What makes Pittman's eventually successful gambit so extraordinary is that the rules of the Treasury office which decides on national charters, the Comptroller of the Currency, state specifically that a bank may not change its charter merely to "circumvent state regulation." Yet that is precisely what Marine Midland and HongShang proposed to do, as Marine Midland's counsel Frank J. Laski told Oct. 22 hearings:

"By June of 1979, it became clear that the Superintendent probably would not approve the transaction . . . the Board of Directors of Marine Midland then concluded that their duties . . . gave them no other alternative than to pursue all proper means of consummating the transaction.

"Accordingly, Marine Midland Bank filed its application to obtain the approval of the Comptroller to convert to a national bank, and upon receipt of that approval, we will take all the steps necessary to effect its conversion into a national bank."

Any self-respecting government agency would have heard that statement and thrown the application out of court, particularly because New York State itself protested the application! But the Comptroller of the Currency tore up its own rules and finally, in February 1980, approved the merger.

However, the fight launched more than a year earlier by the National Anti-Drug Coalition was far from unsuccessful. Outrage over the highhanded behavior of British banks, who attempted to move into America en masse, caused the Congress to put a moratorium on further banking takeovers, keeping Barclays, National Westminster, Midland Bank, and other sister institutions of the HongShang at bay. Through Dope, Inc., public meetings, radio talk shows, public hearings, and press reports, tens of millions of Americans heard the real story of who stood behind the narcotics traffic.

If the United States had a functioning government, the HongShang would still be on the other side of the Pacific Ocean, looking greedily at the untracked veins of American youngsters. That we have let the enemy in through the front door and given it control of a $13 billion banking institution with 300 local branches is a good measure of where the Carter administration has sunk to.

Apart from Golden Triangle heroin, the Drug Enforcement Administration now says, the new heroin epidemic has its origin in Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Iran. It is no coincidence that the consummation of the HongShang takeover of Marine Midland occurred at the beginning of this epidemic.

Whether or not the DEA's statements are accurate, the fact remains that HongShang controls every channel of dirty money traffic from the Indian Ocean to the China Sea. Pakistani tribesmen who grow opium poppies, like their counterparts in the mountain valleys of Northern Thailand, are paid in smuggled gold. But the gold market for that region, based in Dubai on the Arabian Gulf, is controlled by HongShang's wholly-owned subsidiary, the British Bank of the Middle East. Mountain refineries which process bulky opium gum into heroin—ten times the value and one-tenth the volume—obtain the vast amounts of acetic anhydride, the chief chemical in heroin refining, through the vast network of warehousing and transport controlled by the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

Today's Task

Presidential candidate Lyndon H. LaRouche, Jr., wrote in his preface to Dope, Inc., the book he commissioned, "In the war against drugs, as in all warfare, the essential point of a winning strategy is to strike the adversary's command structure while shattering his in-depth potentials for continued warfighting."

G. William Miller: his Treasury Department approved merger

The weak link in the dope traffic's chain of command is still the dirty money laundered through HongShang and similar institutions.

We have a Federal Reserve Chairman who provides credit to heroin smugglers, but not to our industries and cities. Why is Paul Volcker still in office?

We have a Treasury Department that bent over backwards to let the HongShang into the United States, but demands austerity against honest business. Why is G. William Miller still in office?

We have a government behind the scenes, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, that can tear up laws at will, with or without the pretext of emergency conditions. Why has Congress not investigated them?

We have a House Banking Committee Chairman, Henry B. Reuss, who protects dope financiers. Why hasn't he been thrown out?

As the National Anti-Drug Coalition has emphasized all along, this year's presidential campaign is the time for Americans to demand that no candidate be elected who will not defend our youth against those who would destroy it.

Federal agency axes research that showed

Marijuana is a 'hard' drug

Researchers have proved that marijuana's damage to the user is massive, reports physician Ned Rosinsky. But when they applied for funds to continue their work, NIDA said they had found out enough.

Normal brain cells in the Rhesus monkey

Normal Rhesus monkey brain tissue is magnified here using the electron microscope to 30,000 times original size. The black area between B and D is the synaptic cleft (SC), the communication space between two adjacent nerve cells across which the neural impulses must travel for the cells to function normally. The inset shows the synaptic cleft at higher magnification (80,000 times).

Most of the top American research laboratories which were proving the harmful effects of marijuana two years ago are no longer operating. The reason: NIDA, the National Institute on Drug Abuse, under the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, has cut off their money.

The medical facts which these labs produced were the featured material at every international symposium on the medical effects of the drug over the past ten years. For example, it had been shown that moderate exposure to marijuana, in the range of one joint per day for several months, produces brain damage in rhesus monkeys; that marijuana is 30 times worse than cigarettes in producing lung damage, including precancerous changes; and that marijuana in these doses causes sexual hormone abnormalities which result in faulty sperm and egg cell production in humans and increased neonatal death rates in test animals.

Despite these results, and the further long-term experiments which should follow to see if these changes are permanent, NIDA has cut off this research at the "tip of the iceberg" stage.

In these animals the size of the synaptic cleft (magnified 30,000 times) is pathologically widened by an average of 25 percent. This change is associated in the animals with abnormal electrical activity of the cells. The inset, magnified 80,000 times, shows the widening of the synaptic cleft (SC); as well as an accumulation of unidentified dark material in the cleft space.

Animals treated with moderate amounts of marijuana for six months and then kept free of the drug for nine months still showed this evidence of brain damage. This specific type of damage is seen in several other conditions: brain poisoning with such agents as carbon tetrachloride and severe vitamin B deficiency that results in psychosis.

A political question

It is not difficult to pin down the political forces involved in this scandal. During the 1977-79 period when these cuts were made, Jimmy Carter's advisor on drug abuse was Peter Bourne, an open advocate of marijuana decriminalization. Bourne stated during the Senate confirmation hearings on his appointment to head up the Office of Drug Abuse Policy, "Marijuana is no worse than watching TV," and admitted to smoking it himself. During the 1976 presidential campaign Carter made marijuana decrim part of his presidential platform.

Also during this time period the Secretary of HEW, Joseph Califano advocated loosening the marijuana laws. Under Califano, NIDA produced several overviews of the medical literature which distorted the picture by downplaying the evidence of marijuana's harmfulness.

Recently, NIDA has hired Norman Zinberg as an advisor. Zinberg is on the board of advisors of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML), and has been one of the most outspoken advocates for making marijuana use "normal."

Research on Rhesus monkey brain damage has been done by Dr. Robert Heath at Tulane University in New Orleans. Over the past ten years Dr. Heath has shown that moderate amounts of marijuana, the equivalent of one average joint per day, five days a week for three months, causes damage to the cells of the brain of the monkey (fig. 1 and 2).

The specific damage is a widening of the communication space between adjacent brain cells, the synapse, across which the nerve impulse must travel for the cells to "communicate" with one another in order for the brain to function properly. This abnormal separation of the cells correlates with directly measured abnormal electrical activity of the cells.

Memory affected

The area of the brain most heavily affected in this way is the limbic system, a portion of the brain which is important for attention span, short-term memory, and emotional stability. Damage to this area is therefore consistent with the known psychological effects of marijuana, in which these psychological capacities are decreased.

Dr. Heath continued his experiment by subjecting some animals to a total of six months treatment, and then allowing these monkeys to be drug-free for nine months to see if the brain damage healed. He found that it did not, that the brain cells were still damaged.

He then requested that the government allow him to continue the research, to see if the damage would heal after several years or longer; and also to test other parts of the brain to see if they were similarly damaged. NIDA refused the request, saying that he had found out enough.

These further experiments would clearly be crucial, given the current epidemic of marijuana use among the youth of the country. HEW recently published a survey showing that in 1977, 11 percent of high school seniors smoked a joint or more of marijuana every day of their senior year—more than the monkeys were exposed to. These and other millions of Americans very likely now have some form of brain damage, and it is not known whether it is reversible.

A second major researcher who got the axe during this period was Dr. Harris Rosenkrantz of the Mason Research Institute in Worcester, Mass. Rosenkrantz exposed rats and other animals to moderate amounts of marijuana, in the same range as the monkey experiments, and found damage in the sex organs and lungs (Fig. 3-6). The testes of the male rats showed marked atrophy, or destruction of the normal cells, and a disappearance of sperm cell production. The lungs of the animals showed irritative reactions, or inflammation, from the smoke at a rate 30 times greater than from ordinary cigarette smoke. Human lung studies showed similar results. Also, he found precancerous changes in the lungs, changes seen before cancer develops, at 30 times the rate for cigarettes.

Dr. Rosenkrantz was getting material on the precancerous changes ready for publication when he was cut off from NIDA funding last year. He had hoped to continue the experiment, to see if the animals got lung cancer at 30 times the cigarette rate, but now is unable to do so. With the huge rate of marijuana smoking now in the United States, we may be facing a lung cancer epidemic in several decades which will dwarf the effect of cigarettes.

In work related to Rosenkrantz' study of rat testes, Dr. Edith Sassenrath of the University of California at Davis has shown that THC, the psychoactive chemical in marijuana, in moderate amounts can cause pregnant monkeys to have a loss of the fetus, either by miscarriage, still birth, or neonatal death, at an overall rate of four times the normal rate. She showed that this was caused by abnormalities in the female hormones due to the THC.

In 1978 she lost her grant of $75,000 per year. She was planning to take the monkeys off the drug and observe the long term effects of future pregnancies, as well as the long term effect on the offspring which survived.

Based on her research, obstetricians across the country are forbidding pregnant women to smoke marijuana, but again, we only know the tip of the iceberg. How long after quitting marijuana is it safe to conceive? What we do know is that there is a policy to hold back scientific knowledge in this area by an administration committed to drug decriminalization.

Dr. Norman Zinberg (center) as a panelist at a NORML convention: fraudulent studies.

Bogus research being used to push marijuana as a medicine

The New England Journal of Medicine has published a study purporting to show that marijuana should be used as an anti-nausea medicine for patients undergoing cancer chemotherapy, a therapy which often induces vomiting. The experiment compares marijuana with Compazine, a standard drug used to control nausea and vomiting, and concludes that marijuana is better than Compazine.

Based on this report and several others like it, the Food and Drug Administration has been petitioned to allow doctors to prescribe marijuana to patients legally. But the study is a fraud and, not accidentally, one of the authors of the report is Dr. Norman Zinberg, a member of the advisory board of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML), the main lobby in the U.S. for the decriminalization of marijuana.

Why are these incompetent experimental designs being funded by the National Institute of Health? ... The federal narcotics law explains the puzzle.

According to the abstract, or summary, of the study, it is a "randomized, double-blind" trial.

Not double-blind

That is, in keeping with standard experimental procedure, neither the doctor nor the patient knows whether he is receiving the marijuana chemical THC or Compazine until the experiment is over, thereby eliminating prejudice in evaluating the effect of the substances on the patient. This is especially important in evaluating a subjective complaint such as nausea, or a problem such as vomiting which is strongly psychologically determined.

However, the details of the experiment show that it was not double-blind.

First of all, patients were selected for the experiment on the basis that "their nausea and vomiting were inadequately controlled by conventional antiemetics, including the phenothiazines (i.e., Compazine)." That is, patients were asked to join a marijuana experiment if they were not happy with their present therapy. Since nausea is a subjective complaint, the doctor has to take the patient's word for it, and it is not surprising that a number of patients, mostly in their 20s and 30s, volunteered for the "experiment."

That is to say, there was a motivating factor, the offer of free drugs, enticing patients to say that their conventional therapy was not working and to try the THC. There was nothing in the published report to guard against such fraud.

Secondly, the study could not have been double-blind. According to the report, "The antiemetic effect of the THC correlated with the development of a high . . . 32 of 41 courses associated with a high also resulted in a complete response, whereas only 4 of 38 courses without a high resulted in a complete response."¹ Since the patients who felt high therefore knew that they had been given THC, the trial was not double-blind.

Additionally, the patients may have been motivated to lie, saying that the THC had a better antiemetic effect than it actually had, since by doing so they would improve the experimental results for THC and increase the likelihood of having it made a standard therapy for them.

In another recent study,² patients were given THC with no control drug for comparison at all. The requirement for the patient entering the study was failure to control nausea and vomiting with other drugs. This is open to the same problem as the previous study.

Decrim motivation?

Why are these incompetent experimental designs being funded by the National Institute of Health? The same kind of incompetence, especially the lack of a control, characterizes the New Mexico state-run experiment, the model for several other states which have passed "medical decrim" bills in the past two years. Either the researchers are totally incompetent, or they have another purpose in mind.

The federal narcotics law explains the puzzle. Marijuana is currently classified under federal law as a Schedule I narcotic, a substance with a high abuse potential and with no proven medical value, so it cannot be prescribed by a physician. Schedule II substances, while still having a high abuse potential, have a proven medical use, and therefore can be prescribed.

There is nothing in the law that demands that, for a substance to be changed from Schedule I to II it must be better than existing drugs used for the same medical purpose. The decrim advocates, led by NORML, have been fighting for years to have marijuana reclassified into Schedule II, even though penalties for abuse of Schedule II substances may be as great as for certain Schedule I substances.

Why all this medical interest on the part of NORML? The word NORML gives it all away. They want marijuana smoking to be considered "normal," and what better way than to brainwash the public that marijuana is acceptable than by allowing doctors to prescribe it as a medicine.

Presidency 1980: Where the candidates stand on drugs

“Even the Presidency of the United States must be determined on this drug issue,” the National Anti-Drug Coalition roared at its founding convention in Detroit on Sept. 29, 1979. As the summer nominating conventions approach, the field of active presidential candidates has narrowed to five. The NADC circulated a questionnaire to all the candidates earlier this year, and also examined the past records of each of the contenders.

Among the questions we asked were: How would the candidate, as President, conduct foreign policy to clamp down on the drug traffic from abroad? Does he support marijuana decriminalization? Would he permit members of NORML (the marijuana lobby) in his government? Does he favor the resumption of U.S. joint drug eradication programs with foreign countries using the herbicide paraquat? [Following is a survey of what War on Drugs found out.]

Kennedy is the initiator and sponsor of Senate Bill 1722, which will make possession of small amounts of marijuana punishable by a summons—roughly the equivalent of a traffic ticket. Under the heading "Possessing Drugs," S. 1722 reads:

(c) Arrest precluded—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a person who commits an offense consisting solely of an infraction under this section may not be arrested for the offense but instead shall be issued a summons.

(d) Grading—An offense described in this section is . . . (3) a Class C misdemeanor (maximum $500 fine) if the controlled substance is more than 30 grams, but less than 150 grams of marijuana; and (4) an infraction if the controlled substance is 30 grams or less of marijuana.

Only after the second conviction for marijuana possession can an individual be sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

Kennedy's former brother-in-law, actor Peter Lawford, is an active member of the Advisory Board of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML) and has done gratis radio spots to raise money and support for NORML's campaign to legalize marijuana.

Lyndon LaRouche

Conviction for use of marijuana or other substances shall cause loss of both driver's license and gun license for a term of one year for a first offense. Detoxification shall also be mandatory. Although it is not desirable to fill our prisons with users who are not sellers of such substances, appropriate fines and probationary control are required.

"Selling of small amounts of marijuana shall carry a mandatory sentence of one year for a first offense. Selling or carrying of amounts of a retail value of $100 or more shall carry a mandatory sentence of 5 years.

"Importation of unlawful such substances into the U.S. or its territorial waters shall carry a mandatory sentence of 20 years.

"We can and will end this epidemic of mind-altering substances. We will not sit back, moan impotently, to see our posterity, our nation destroyed ounce by ounce."

*Point Six,
LaRouche's Six-Point Program*

LaRouche supports drug eradication programs, including the use of paraquat.

Past record

An active supporter and initiator of the National Anti-Drug Coalition, LaRouche commissioned the bestseller, Dope Inc.: Britain's Opium War Against the United States.

Ronald Reagan
Republican

February 17, 1980: Junior Chamber of Commerce Candidates Night, Milford, New Hampshire.

Questioned by a European journalist about his policy on mind-altering drugs, Reagan stated that there is no way to stop drug distribution at the source. "It's like trying to carry water in a sieve," he said.

Past record

Reagan conceded that drug use multiplied in California during his tenure as governor, (the Haight-Asbury "summer of love" occurred then) but insisted that this was a "national pattern" about which little could have been done. All that is possible is to educate people about drugs, he said.

In answer to a questionnaire circulated by the National Anti-Drug Coalition Reagan wrote:

"I would use my powers as President to a) augment the resources and powers of the United States Customs to detect the attempted smuggling of narcotics abroad; b) apply political and economic pressures on other nations through appropriate international agencies for the cessation of drug traffic, making clear it is in our interest to do so; and c) propose stiff new penalties for international drug trafficking.

"I do favor the enactment of stronger anti-narcotics laws for the sale of psychoactive drugs, including marijuana, and for some kinds of possession, such as possession for sale or distribution. I am firmly opposed to decriminalization of marijuana, hashish, cocaine, or other mind altering drugs under State or federal laws. . . ."

But Reagan advisor Milton Friedman, advocates full drug decriminalization (see page 48).

John Anderson
Independent

As of May 22, Anderson was the favored presidential candidate of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, the front organization for the powerful U.S. drug lobby.

In answer to a questionnaire circulated by the National Anti-Drug Coalition Anderson, the Republican running as an "independent," wrote:

"... A president has only limited ability to influence the drug policies of other nations. Therefore, he or she must adopt overall bilateral policies that increase our credibility and influence with the leaders of nations where drug traffic originates. . . ."

"I am of two minds on the question of marijuana. . . . After adolescence and postnatal periods, the government indeed may have less authority and ability to prevent marijuana use. Therefore, if I find that decriminalization of marijuana and revised approaches to its control can lessen the availability of marijuana to these groups in risk, I may endorse changes in the existing anti-marijuana statutes.

"Regarding paraquat, I wrote the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare urging a cessation of paraquat treatment. I believed that paraquat presented an extreme health hazard and that the federal government should not endanger anyone by this policy. . . ."

"The ultimate responsibility is with the family, and we must encourage a positive atmosphere for family life if we are to have the "positive culture" you describe."

Executive Intelligence Review, May 13, 1980: "Anderson could be the lightning rod to attract all the energies of the Aquarian Conspiracy" said Dr. William Whitsun, founder of the California-based institution Novus, which he described as part of this conspiracy for a transition to a drug permissive, low technology U.S. society.

Let your party and your candidates know what you expect of them on the drug issue, and let them know your vote in November will reflect the way they act.

WIN the War on Drugs—

The National Anti-Drug Coalition isn't looking for people who are 'upset' about the drug epidemic. We are out to recruit soldiers and fighters who can WIN this war against Dope, Inc.—the international drug cartel that is doping and brainwashing the children of the United States. N.J. meeting blasts liberals for 'sex education' mandate

At a town meeting May 22 in West Orange, New Jersey, Citizens for LaRouche, the National Anti-Drug Coalition, Citizens for New Jersey and concerned clergy from several denominations took the liberals to task for plotting the destruction of New Jersey's children with drugs and "sex education."

The meeting, called under the title "Save the Children," culminated a month-long campaign to halt efforts by the State Board of Education to force-feed a pornographic "family life education" program to state schools.

The 50 person audience represented a cross section of New Jersey citizens. Representatives attended from the Newark area NAACP, the Baptist Ministerial Alliance, the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the Italian Anti-Defamation League of UNICA, a Presbyterian congregation, the National Rifle Association, Catholics United for the Faith, and the Newark Tenants Council.

Also present were a professor of theology from Fordham University in New York, a professor of biology from Seton Hall, an independent minister with six storefront churches in the Newark area, six Democratic delegate nominees for presidential candidate Lyndon LaRouche, and numbers of concerned parents.

Many of those speaking at and attending the meeting have been working against an April 8 State Board of Education decision mandating by a vote of 9 to 1, all public schools to develop and teach the "sex education" program in all grades from kindergarten to twelve by 1983.

The Town Meeting opened with an invocation by Rev. Washington of the Newark Area Baptist Conference. Phil Rubinstein of Citizens for New Jersey then outlined the fraud being perpetrated by the State Board of Education.

The board insists that the pornographic materials it recommends are not mandatory for the program, yet, Rubinstein revealed, there are only two places where local schools can get assistance in planning this curriculum. Both are controlled by the Sex Information and Education Council for the U.S. (SIECUS), a brainwashing outfit set up by the same people who created the drug counterculture (see page 14).

Rubinstein showed how children of the 1980s would be groomed as thought police against their own parents through such programs. "The only experiment for the nation is going to be the victory of stopping this program," he said.

NADC intervenes

Following a speech by Father Paul Wickens and a musical presentation, two speakers from the National Anti-Drug Coalition further developed the link between drugs and "family life education" in destroying youth. Physician Ned Rosinsky of the NADC gave a slide presentation on the dangerous medical effects of marijuana on the human brain and reproductive system. The editor of War on Drugs also greeted the gathering.

'Our bishops let us down'

Father Paul Wickens of St. Venantius Church in Orange, an outspoken opponent of drug legalization, attacked liberalism's influence on the Roman Catholic bishops of New Jersey at the May 22 meeting. "Bishop Gerety (Archbishop Peter Gerety of Newark) could call a press conference any time, and millions of people would be reached" if he spoke out against the so-called sex education mandate, Wickens said. "But he has not done it."

"Our bishops have let us down," he charged. "In Trenton, at hearings before the Senate Education Committee on this matter, the only people testifying besides the State Board of Education were all against this mandate. Then Elmer Matthews, a lawyer representing the Catholic Conference . . . gave testimony that the Catholic bishops of New Jersey, with enthusiasm, support sex education in the schools!" Wickens said.

"The bishops have taken a position diametrically opposed to 90 percent of the Catholic people—it's a spiritual blindness," caused by liberalism, he continued. "Liberalism is a mania."

"Liberals get a little start: like taking one petal from a flower at a time . . . pretty soon there is no more flower. Now they are picking off the petals of the Judaeo-Christian tradition." Thanks to liberal reforms, today "there is no morality in the criminal code of New Jersey." If the "sex education" mandate goes through, Wickens warned, "we will be interrupting almost irreversibly the mind and development of the child."

Wickens strongly refuted charges that he is "anti-Gerety," stating that he loves and respects the Archbishop as a son to a father. But if the father fails in his duty, the son must correct him, Wickens said.

Dr. Rosinsky scored the prodrug New York Times, which just a week earlier had published an editorial attack on the opponents of the New Jersey sex mandate. The Times, which has published many editorials supporting marijuana decriminalization, admitted in a recent article that medical evidence against marijuana was piling up—but portrayed the mind-killing substance as a mere "recreational drug" comparable to alcohol.

"Consider the fact that 11 percent of high school seniors today use marijuana every day. Look at what this does to their ability to think, to create conceptions, form judgments. Children are vulnerable to being manipulated around their infantile impulses. Drugs promote psychological regression in young people, leaving a fertile field for sexual fantasy."

"The 'sex educators' use this to destroy a child's morality," Dr. Rosinsky charged.

LaRouche spokesman vows international fight

In introducing the next speaker, Phil Rubinstein pointed out that "sex education" had been made a presidential campaign issue by the New Jersey state legislature, where leading Democrats attempted to put a lid on the issue by deferring any decision until after the June 3 presidential primary. Voting on strict partisan lines, the Democrats used procedural maneuvers to table a bill introduced by Republican Assemblywoman Marie Muhler that would have stopped the Board of Education mandate.

Informed sources in Trenton, the state capital, made no secret of the fact that they were seeking to contain LaRouche's influence by quashing the issue until after the primary, Rubinstein reported. He then introduced Warren Hamerman, national campaign director for Lyndon LaRouche, the only candidate who responded to an invitation to address the meeting.

Hamerman began by vowing to make the sex education battle a national and international fight. He compared it to the mobilization launched last January by the LaRouche campaign to save the life of 78-year-old Earle Spring, condemned to "euthanasia" or mercy killing by a Massachusetts court. The court ruled that if he were mentally competent, Spring would want to be removed from life-sustaining kidney treatments.

Leading international figures such as Dr. Emmanuel Tremblay, the head of the European right to life movement, and the Italian priest and antidrug leader Father Redento Tignonsini had traveled to the United States and fought for the life of Spring, Hamerman reported.

Scores church corruption

The LaRouche representative reported that Father Tignonsini was shocked by the corruption he found in the American Catholic church. "We will take the issue of corruption to the Vatican and to the same international leaders who stepped forward to save Earle Spring," Hamerman promised. The LaRouche campaign had just put out a leaflet denouncing Archbishop Gerety of Newark, who supports the sex mandate as well as drug decriminalization, as the "Archbishop of Sodom and Gomorrah."

"Above the forces pushing sex education directly there are others: a small group of ruling families who control world economic relations. They control the World Bank. The World Bank is taking poor countries of the world and ordering them to plant the drugs which they are then going to push down your children's throats.

"The World Bank and International Monetary Fund have developed a program to destroy, through genocide, the populations of the developing sector. Right now Asian children live in conditions that are not fit for animals. This will be the future of America unless we stop it," Hamerman said.

Moynagh, Frolund lead NADC musical coalition

WEST ORANGE, N.J., May 23— "In two pages of genius we are taken through a story of adolescent love and then made to laugh," explained soprano Joan Moynagh to an audience at the Town and Campus Restaurant here last night. "These are delights to our mind; this is how we get our 'kicks.'"

Miss Moynagh, well known to concert and operatic audiences throughout Europe and the United States and also a professor of voice at Miami University at Oxford, Ohio, was referring to Mozart's song "Das Veilchen" (The Violet). This was one of a selection of songs by Mozart and Schubert performed at an event sponsored by the Citizens for New Jersey coalition in opposition to an "Aquarian" sex education program recently mandated by the Board of Education in that state.

Miss Moynagh was accompanied by pianist Bodil Frolund, a well known concert and recital soloist in her native Denmark and elsewhere. The musical portion of the program was completed by a performance of J.S. Bach's Suite in C Major for unaccompanied violoncello by violist Donna Randall, a student of Michael Tree at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia.

The musical presentation by Moynagh, Frolund and Randall served as a powerful counterpoint to the grim picture painted by the other speakers by demonstrating the power of great music to instill the moral and intellectual qualities required to turn the next generation into productive, creative human beings—a task identified by Citizens for New Jersey leader Philip Rubenstein as "necessary to the very survival of our country in the immediate period ahead."

Joan Moynagh and Bodil Frolund are founding members of a musical coalition formed in 1979 in support of the efforts of the National Anti-Drug Coalition and also of the presidential campaign of Democratic Party candidate Lyndon LaRouche. The founding document of that coalition read, in part, "Great music can and must serve as the most powerful force for reinstating among youth and the nation as a whole the same moral outlook which motivated the founding of America. . . . No musician can stand by passively as an entire generation is rendered morally and intellectually insensible by the dissemination of drugs. No more tolerable is the even broader saturation of the same population of youth with successively more degraded forms of rock 'music' which reinforce drug use and have the same effect upon mental powers as do marijuana, opiates, and cocaine."

Following the release of this document in the summer of 1979, Joan Moynagh, Bodil Frolund and other signators began a series of benefit concerts for the antidrug effort as well as classes and demonstrations of the principles of musical counterpoint for youth programs, drug rehabilitation centers and church congregations.

Particularly active in the New York-New Jersey area has been the Polish born soprano Alina Brychova. Representative of these musical activities was a concert program given by Brychova at the Holy Spirit Church in the Bronx in the spring of 1979. In addition to a selection of songs and arias by Bach, Handel and Beethoven, Miss Brychova performed the solo part of Haydn's Missa Brevis in a joint appearance with the Humanist Academy Chorus under the direction of John Sigerson.

East Harlem concert

Later in 1979 pianist Bodil Frolund presented a recital of classical works on the premises of a drug rehabilitation program in the devastated hispanic community of Manhattan's upper east side. Her performance was supplemented by concise bilingual demonstrations of contrapuntal-polyphonic principles by the Humanist Academy's Vivian Zoakos using excerpts from the same works.

Backed up by classes and workshops which make canonical principles upon which polyphonic counterpoint is based understandable to former addicts and public school children alike, these concert programs have visibly begun to create a new audience for classical music. This was demonstrated most recently by a substantial turnout by youth from the Harlem community at a piano recital by the Italian pianist Carlo Levi Minzi at the Manhattan School of Music, an event sponsored by the Humanist Academy.

Natural to the mind

How does great music itself contribute to the war against drugs? "This music is based upon the principles of the intellect itself, it is natural to the mind, therefore it is delightful," explained Miss Moynagh to last night's gathering. Later in the program, Dr. Ned Rosinsky of the NADC pointedly observed that "the effects of even marijuana on the brain destroy the attention span of even a casual user to the extent that he would be incapable of grasping the content of the kind of music that was performed here tonight."

The objective of the musical coalition is to restore the musical tradition of Beethoven to its rightful position as "American popular music," both through building the new audience for classical music and through recruiting a broad assemblage of musical forces into the effort. The level of musical excitement and talent in the young generation produced in this process will result in the rapid extension of that tradition beyond the framework of Beethoven's own works. To the extent they succeed, it is likely that this will constitute the death blow to the "popular taste" for drugs.

Urge Quebec bill vs. glue sniffing

Denouncing such physiological dangers of toluene glue inhalation as "disorders to the brain, the heart, the central nervous system . . . and death by asphyxiation," the Quebec Anti-Drug Coalition announced in May a campaign to ban the sale of glue to children under 18 years of age.

A resolution calling on the government of Quebec to adopt a bill "to control the sale and use of glue" has been issued by the Coalition.

The QADC achieved acclaim throughout Quebec last January when it led a successful fight to shut down a local grocery store in Montreal North for peddling large quantities of toxic glue to schoolchildren. That victory led to a citywide mobilization of parents, teachers and church groups culminating in a 200-person antidrug conference March 20 in Montreal.

Glue sniffing 'epidemic'

The "Bill to Control the Sale and Use of Glue in Quebec" cites the "generalized epidemic of drugs and the increasing number of children sniffing glue in the primary and secondary schools of the province of Quebec," and outlines the physiological damages caused by glue sniffing.

It then scores "antisocial tendencies" produced by the use of glue, noting that its use can lead to juvenile criminality by "fostering in the user the practice of violent acts against himself and others . . . and rejection of all forms of authority."

Most devastating of all, "the inhalation of toluene leads to dependence and seriously interferes with the normal psychological development of the individual, causing school attendance problems and altering intellectual capabilities by increasing anxieties, failures to concentrate and loss of memory and perception."

The resolution then notes the absence of legislation, the extensive availability of these substances and their insignificant cost, and urges the government of Quebec to adopt the following bill to control their sale and use:

"Any glue or cement containing toluene, or any substance with similar toxic effect, must be labeled "poison" and the Ministry of Health and Welfare must certify that such substances contain malodorous or sneeze-provoking ingredients. This applied also to glue sold as part of a model kit. No poison, as defined in the bill, can be sold to anyone under the age of 18."

New Buffalo law hits head shops

As a result of a lobbying effort spearheaded by the Buffalo Anti-Drug Coalition, the Buffalo County Legislature unanimously passed a bill April 17 aimed at cleaning up "head shops" and other retailers of drug-related paraphernalia.

The Pauly bill, sponsored by County legislator Bill Pauly, will impose legal penalties up to and including imprisonment for possession of any item "adapted" for use with drugs. Both the clerks and proprietors of outlets which sell these items can be penalized. The bill passed by a vote of 20-0.

Various liberal community groups attempted unsuccessfully to have the bill watered down so that only the sale of drug paraphernalia to minors would be considered a criminal offense. At least one local head shop has hired a lawyer to strike down the bill. The American Civil Liberties Union will probably also oppose the bill, sources say.

Italy's Cossiga gov't target of antidrug fight

The current Italian government of Francesco Cossiga is a major asset of "Dope, Inc.," the international drug running cartel. But it faces strong opposition in the country from the political antidrug movement that successfully defeated former Health Minister Altissimo's plan for legalizing heroin in the fall and winter of 1979-80.

That movement, led by the Italian Anti-Drug Coalition, is now determined to block the marijuana decriminalization legislation backed by the Cossiga forces in the national parliament, and make sure that the prodrug public officials right up to the Prime Minister himself are quickly booted out of office.

Approximately one year ago, the Partito Operaio Europeo (European Labor Party, or POE) began circulating a pamphlet titled "Who Finances the Opium War," in Italy. The pamphlet drew material from the American paperback Dope, Inc. which was used to build the Anti-Drug Coalition in the United States, and also identifying the political spokesmen of the drug multinational within Italy.

The ferment created by the pamphlet was so great that when, last September, the Liberal Party health minister, Altissimo (the name means "very high" in Italian) presented his proposal to sell heroin to addicts in pharmacies, the immediate general public reaction was so hostile that he was forced to withdraw the plan after a few weeks.

Meanwhile, the National Anti-

Jolanda Lucarini of the Rome city council health committee, flanked by Prof. Muriel Mirak of Milan University and the European Labor Party, and Dr. Passalacqua of the Pharmacists' Association (last on right).

Drug Coalition had been officially founded in the United States, in September of 1979. Only days later, on Oct. 5, the founding committee of the Italian Anti-Drug Coalition held its first public meeting in Milan.

The Italian ADC drew together the conservative moral forces from Italy's two largest parties, the Italian Communist Party (PCI), which is based on the trade unions, and the Catholic Christian Democratic Party (DC). Former DC deputies like Jolanda Lucarini, Catholic representatives of the National Association of Pharmacists, like Doctor Passalacqua, and Catholic priests such as Don Redento Tignonsini of the Archdiocese of Brescia joined with POE representatives to form the founding committee of what became known as the "Coalizione Antidroga."

In mass meetings in Rome and Milan held between October and December, the newly formed coalition made Altissimo's bill their first target. In Milan, a city with more than 20,000 heroin addicts in a population of 2 million, more than a hundred participants in one event signed a telegram to Altissimo demanding a stop to the insane drive to legalization.

Altissimo was attacked by the DC official party paper, Il Popolo, and even publicly scored by his own deputy minister, Christian Democrat Orsini.

Italy's other large party, the Communist Party, (whose trade-union base is what Americans would call 'conservative' and progress-oriented) continues to this day to be split on the drug issue. One faction, particularly dominant in the PCI's youth movement, was behind Altissimo and today supports the marijuana decriminalization bill before the national parliament. Another faction showed its vehement disagreement by publishing an article against decrim on Sept. 5 that quoted from the book Dope, Inc.

The group behind that article then invited Rosanna Impiccini, the Italian ADC's national coordinator, to address the party's national conference on drugs in Milan. Impiccini stressed that "the struggle against drugs cannot just hit the simple smuggler: it must be an international fight against the banks, the distribution networks and the political structures responsible for the production, sale and propaganda in favor of drugs."

As a result, Altissimo was forced to appoint a special commission of experts to judge his plan, who went to Great Britain where heroin is dispensed legally by the government. They reported back that it made the problem worse.

Current fight

After this public defeat, "Dope, Inc." reorganized its offensive at a higher level. At the February national congress of the Christian Democracy, the moderate group around former Premier Andreotti that had been collaborating with the PCI against terrorism and drugs was defeated. The faction that won, dominated by Italy's old noble families, promptly set up an alliance with the ultraleftist Socialist Party, which advocates drug liberalization and negotiation with terrorists.

Cossiga formed a second government, this time with a Socialist Party health minister. It was Aldo Aniasi, former mayor of Milan, under whose long tenure Milan became a coven of drug addiction.

The Socialist Party has joined with the small but well financed Radical Party—a prodrug, gay rights group which Cossiga admitted to the parliamentary majority—in sponsoring a bill to completely destroy current antidrug legislation. It proposes not only to decriminalize marijuana but to stop prosecution of those who "proselytize" in favor of drugs.

ADC election intervention

The Italian Anti-Drug Coalition is now making drugs the main issue of the June 8 regional elections, which have no direct effect on the national government but are being viewed by all as a signal of whether the unpopular Cossiga regime can last. The coalition has a leaflet out in Milan informing voters that two candidates, the Social Democrat Antonio Gaspari for city council, and POE leader Fiorella Operto for regional council, have taken an uncompromising stand against "Dope, Inc."

If such candidates are successful in the regional balloting—and the tens of thousands of ADC pamphlets sold in Milan are evidence they will be—then the Cossiga government known in the press as the "call girl" government may be very short lived.

German ADC goes after the 'culture' of drugs

From all objective readings, West Germany stands today where the United States was ten years ago—faced with the most serious drug epidemic in the nation's history. Last year in West Germany, there were 600 officially recorded deaths from heroin overdose—in absolute numbers and percentage of population greater than U.S. statistics for 1979. An estimated 3 million residents of the country have used some kind of drugs.

Drug abuse is even more prevalent inside the prisons than on the streets, and therapy centers are grossly inadequate. At the same time, a corrupt movement is growing in university sociology departments and government layers explaining that the drug culture is impossible to stop, since it is a "natural outgrowth of societal conditions."

This situation is the backdrop for the activities for the campaign against drugs being waged by the West German Anti-Drug Coalition. Since its founding in January 1980, the West German ADC has become the leading organization in the Federal Republic against the drug menace. In every major city, the ADC's slogan "Krieg dem Rauschgift" (War on Drugs), is seen on automobile bumpers. Over 40,000 of these stickers with a picture of the barred marijuana leaf—the international symbol of the ADCs—have been sold. Sixty thousand copies of the West German ADC quarterly magazine are in circulation, detailing the medical dangers of marijuana and other psychotropic drugs, and giving comprehensive accounts of how the drug traffic and prodrug lobby function.

Speaking on May 22 before an ADC meeting in Stuttgart, Professor Reimers, the head of the state psychiatric hospital, echoed the earlier statement of Dr. Rolf Pauls, president of the West German ADC: "I fully agree that the cause for this drug epidemic does not lie with the youth. It is the result of an international conspiracy which is seducing the labile types of youth." Attacking another prodrug myth Reimers continued, "I must stress, from clinical experience, that there is no increase in creativity through the use of drugs as some people claim."

The scandal of Bremen

Reimers was speaking before an audience of over 50 people, consisting of representatives of local school boards, parents' associations and other institutions. Joining him at the podium were Dr. Pauls, Professor Schmidt, director of Forensic Medicine in the city, Dr. Durst, president of the neurologic and psychiatric organization and Mathias Mletzko, the ADC's expert on the drug lobby.

Dr. Durst continued the theme with the challenge that "the main problem is that society is beginning to tolerate the drug problem . . . in the 1960s only the hippies were involved in drugs. Now, unfortunately, the problem is extending even to young workers."

Making the picture concrete, Mletzko gave a detailed account of the city of Bremen, where two weeks ago—proterrorist demonstrators attacked police with rocks and molotov cocktails, resulting in over 200 injuries to police. Mletzko described a section of the city which has been totally given over to the proterrorist counterculture—communities and "alternative life" projects dominate the section, slogans supporting the Baader-Meinhof terrorists are written on the walls.

Youth centers, funded by the city and state government are an integral part of the "scene." Bremen is also one of the centers of the sociological studies groups which is creating the rationale for drug legalization—marijuana and hashish now, "hard" drugs later.

Target drug promoters

Just 10 days before in Nuremberg, the ADC overturned the controlled prodrug atmosphere at a meeting on drugs organized by the local youth center, Komm (in English, Come) headed by an open drug advocate, Mr. Popp. The ADC in a leaflet exposed Popp's statement: "We have to learn to live with drugs. We have to be tolerant and we have to change our attitudes toward the consumption of hard drugs. We have to accept the expansion of drugs as a reality we live with because there is no society free from drugs. Furthermore, the consuming of drugs has a positive aspect because it may be the sign of a new cultural feeling."

The response by the Nuremberg audience was to demand that the representative of the ADC address the conference to counter the lies of the prodrug spokesman.

Even in official government circles, the ADC is gaining recognition as the only national authorities on the drug problem. On May 5 and 6, at a meeting on "Internal Security in the 1980s" organized by the Interior Ministry of the State of Rhineland-Palatinate, Professor Frey, the international president of the Society for Emergency Medicine, quoted extensively from the Founding Principles of the Anti-Drug Coalition in his presentation to 300 high level state employees, including police, presidents from other states, state prosecutors and others. Frey then introduced Dr. Pauls for a 20 minute presentation from the floor.

Milton Friedman is a very selfless man. He wants to give your sons and daughters the "right" to become drug addicts. He says that the "freedom to choose" to destroy one's mind and body is a fundamental human right that society must protect. He's been working for years to repeal all legal restrictions on heroin, marijuana, LSD, angel dust, cocaine, etc., in order to guarantee that right. And he wants to stop you from infringing on someone else's right to get hooked on drugs.

This self-styled conservative economist who's been advising Ronald Reagan since the mid-1970s, first went public with his prodrug stand in a column that appeared in the May 1, 1972 issue of the liberal magazine, Newsweek under the title "Prohibition and Drugs."

First, he stated on what he termed "ethical grounds," that "... I believe that we have no right to use force, directly or indirectly, to prevent a fellow man from committing suicide, let alone from drinking alcohol or taking drugs. ..."

Second, he claimed that prohibiting drugs "is an attempted cure that makes matters worse—for both the addict and the rest of us," whereas legalizing drugs would help both the addict and the rest of society. Although "legalizing drugs might increase the number of addicts," that's not the important point. "Whatever happens to the number of addicts, the individual addict would clearly be far better off if drugs were legal. Today, drugs are both incredibly expensive and highly uncertain in quality.

"Addicts are driven to associate with criminals to get drugs, become criminals themselves to finance the habit, and risk constant danger of death and disease. ... Legalizing drugs would simultaneously reduce the amount of crime and raise the quality of law enforcement.

In conclusion, he asserted that quashing the illegal drug trade is impossible:

"But, you say, must we accept defeat? Why not simply end the drug traffic? We cannot end the drug traffic ... so long as large sums of money are involved—and they are bound to be if drugs are illegal—it is literally hopeless to expect to end the traffic or even to reduce seriously its scope."

© The Hong Kong connection:

In September 1978, Milton Friedman hailed Hong Kong as "the modern exemplar of free markets and limited government." The occasion was the meeting in the British crown colony of the Mont Pelerin Society, an elite and secretive body set up by the pretender to the Austrian imperial throne, Otto von Hapsburg. Friedman is Mont Pelerin's vice president.

Friedman's admiration for Hong Kong may be linked to his insistence the drug trade cannot be stopped. As David Goldman documents in this issue, the illegal drug trade is a tightly organized international network run from the top by a group of merchant-banking families based primarily in London and Hong Kong. They set drug prices, control distribution and production, and dictate the political conditions enabling them to do business with little interference from law enforcement.

© Pacification:

On a radio program broadcast in Atlanta last year, Friedman avowed his admiration for Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's finance minister. He has applied Schacht's policies in his "advisory" capacity for the governments of Chile and Israel, two countries that have skyrocketing inflation.

Under Schacht and Hitler, German laborers were given synthetic heroin ("dolphine," now known as methadone) to enable them to bear backbreaking labor without complaint.

© What to do:

Call Ronald Reagan's presidential campaign headquarters (213-670-9161). Find out why Reagan is taking advice from a prodrug kook like Friedman. Demand that Reagan come out and denounce Friedman's stand on drugs. Friedman himself can be reached at the Hoover Institution in Palo Alto, California (415-497-1754). Or try the Republican National Committee (202-484-6500) and register your disgust with their toleration of Friedman's immorality.

Founding principles of the National Anti-Drug Coalition

We stand confronted with a great moral crisis threatening our nation, drug abuse. We must turn the tide on this alien antiprogress epidemic, which if left unopposed will result in the destruction of our society's moral fabric.

We cannot stand by watching organized crime push drugs, knowing full well that its result and its intent are to destroy the minds of our children and our skilled workforce—and therefore, our institutions and our country.

For two decades now, our industrial economy and its supporting educational system have been systematically dismantled. American labor, technicians and scientists are being destroyed, our industrial plants and cities are shutting down. Drugs are a major contributing factor in this process.

The National Anti-Drug Coalition is dedicated to forming a national machine capable of ridding the nation of the menace of psychotropic substances. Secondly, we must make the penalty very high for those leaders who are either doing nothing or are a contributing factor in the problem. Even the Presidency of the United States must be determined on this drug issue.

We commit ourselves to:

- mandatory antidrug education programs in all schools.
 - stopping all legislation for "decriminalization" and reduction of drug penalties; launching an offensive for "recrim" and tough enforcement against pushers.
 - telling our youth who is pushing marijuana—a dangerous drug—and why.
 - curbing ACLU and other phony liberal efforts to block parents and school administrators from searches and other procedures to crack down on drugs in schools.
 - collaborating with the Anti-Drug Coalition in Western Europe and the Colombian Anti-Drug Coalition, as well as all other organizations combating the drug plague internationally.
 - stopping "decrim" at the federal level, introduced in Senator Edward Kennedy's S. 1722 bill. Repealing the Percy amendment to stop U.S. funding of paraquat programs.
 - electing only candidates committed to eradicating drugs in the state, local and national elections.
